A PARTIAL ARREST.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOWARD M. STRONG

HE square on which the court-house of Neosho had stood, before its burning by Confederate bush-whackers, presented an animated scene. The motley collection might be resolved into white tepees, kicking ponies, fighting dogs, and brightlyblanketed Indians. Their presence signified that another quarterly allowance was about to be squandered-mainly on bad whiskey; for this liquid evil was strictly forbidden inside the Territory, and even over the line it was necessary to dispense it to the road man with every degree of caution.

Although busily engaged in fleecing the Indians upon this occasion, the inhabitants of Neosho had opportunity to note the arrival of two white strangers a man and a woman. The woman, they learned later, was Miss Monica, the new school-teacher; and the man was Mister Jake.

Mister Jake, the people soon learned, was not much given to words; he smiled. The smile was so constant that it became proverbial. It spread over his bronzed face like wave marks on a mud flat-and many were deceived thereby. There came a time, however, when the storm did break, and it reminded the onlookers of forked lightning out of a clear sky.

"His shootin' is uncommon deadly," observed Meagher, the proprietor of the Old Home, as they carried out the two punctured half-breeds that had picked a quarrel with Mister Jake.

"I never saw it done more mortal." Without heeding this eulogistic remark, Mister Jake lounged over to a lop-sided pooltable, chalked a cue, and drove the white ball against the pyramid, pocketing fifteen balls on the break. From that day Mister Jake was treated with greatest consideration. Any person who could make fifteen pockets on the break, and shoot two men while they had the drop on him, was undoubtedly capable of transacting his own business. It is true the .nere was much secret merriment over the voluminous pattern of his buckskin breeches; but then a man's "duds" was no killing matter in Neosho.

"I saw that grinnin' idiot over at the new school-teacher's the other night," remarked Bud Spurr, during one of Mister Jake's periodic absences from the Old Home. "He was talkin' with her as pert as you please."

"Better let him talk," advised Meagher.

"Truth is," continued Spurr, "I've been payin' some attention in that direction myself. Mister Jake ain't goin' to stand in my way

As a matter of fact, Spurr made it a point to avoid the society of Miss Monica whenever Mister Jake was in town. He was no coward. neither was he hunting trouble. There were other ways of removing so formidable a rival and Bud Spurr was not the man to let any opportunity escape.

"That Mister Jake seems to have a lot of business over in the Territory," Spurr hinted the deputy. on several occasions. "It don't look straight."

"I reckon he's only poachin' over the line," said Meagher. "An' if any man here can prove road. A moment later the deputy was in the he's never done the same, the house'll stand treat."

One morning a deputy marshal and two Indians rode into Neosho.

"We're makin' for Baxter Springs," the representative of the law announced, when that he insisted upon clearing the place and questioned by the curious loungers. "We'll rest up a bit here before going on."

When the deputy had remained a week in Neosho, matters began to grow ominous. Many of the leading citizens seriously considered the advisability of a sudden disappearance from the scene of action.

"I tell you the atmosphere's goin' to be clearer before long," Bud Spurr declared mysteriously. "Every one can take a full breath then, and not run the risk of some grinnin' idiot shootin' him in the back."

If Spurr referred to the departure of the deputy-marshal he was undoubtedly correct; for the following day the officer and his two Indians mounted their horses and struck over into the Territory.

Two days later the same party, augmented by one, rode back into Neosho, covered with white dust, but jubilant. In their midst was Mister Jake, wearing leg-irons, hand-cuffs, and a smile. Dismounting stiffly from their winded horses, they entered the Old Home. In a few moments the room was packed to suffoca-

"Speak up, pardner," some one suggested; "let's hear how it was."

The deputy cleared his throat, leaned back against the bar with an air of pride and waved his hand for silence.

into the Territory. So Pryor, the agent for the Cherokees, picked out his best man, and told him to find the leak. It was found in the person of Mister Jake. Gentlemen, he's the smoothest article I ever had the good fortune to meet. Inside of his floopin' breeches were fifteen pockets, every one holdin' a pint flask of red-eye. I caught him in the very act of sellin' it to the poor Indians."

"Mister Jake," shouted Wickes, a cowpuncher, "has the deputy put it straight?"

"It's a fact, boys," said Mister Jake. "Some men run to one kind of business, and some take to another. But it looks as if it was all up with me now for a while."

"It looks that way," said the proprietor of the Old Home, shaking his head dubiously. 'An' for one, I'm uncommon sad to see it."

An Indian pushed his way through the crowd and grunted in the ear of the deputy.

"Well," said that officer, "we'll have to be gettin' on to-night. If you have any goodbyes to say, Mister Ja'te, you'd better prepare to say 'em. "Boys," Mister Jake began, "I may never again see you all, so I'm going to ask every one to step up and have something with me." "I'm with you," Bud Spurr responded with alacrity.

"Judas!" some one cried, while hisses sounded all over the room. "None of that now, boys," said Mister Jake; we won't think of anything unpleasant. Will the deputy kindly feel in my pocket for a little dust to reimburse the house.'

After much joking as to which of his fifteen pockets he meant, the deputy found the necessary amount and settled for the treat.

"Mister Jake," called a voice from the crowd, before you go you might give us that exhibition shot of yours. We haven't all seen it." "Wait an' I'll light the lamps," volunteered Meagher. "Never mind," Mister Jake protested. "Open that shutter by the table and there'll be enough moonlight for the proceedings." "Take off his bracelets," said Wi ing forward. "Give him a chance to make the shot." The deputy started to comply, felt in his pocket, then suddenly grew confused and shook his head.

"No, no," he muttered, "it can't be doneagainst orders." "Ah, get out!" sneered the men, "you're afraid of him! Give the man a show."

"Can't do it," the deputy protested. "Never mind, boys," smiled Mister Jake. 'Just stand clear of the moonlight and I'll do it anyhow." Grasping the cue in both hands, he shot it forward against the cueball, which in turn bounded against the pyramid of balls at the upper end of the table. With a quick succession of sharp clicks the balls rattled into the pockets. The table was badly sagged at two corners, and after several sharp caroms the three last balls began to slow roll for the pockets.

"Thirteen," counted the crowd. "Fourteen-

The fifteenth ball hung on the edge of the pocket, caught by a slight wrinkle in the cloth. "Here it goes," cried Mister Jake, and he leaped lightly upon the table; then with a graceful dive he shot head first through the open window.

The last ball clacked into a pocket. "Fifteen pockets-and a break,"

they heard the wild clatter of hoofs far up the saddle, and spurring his horse for a great effort, he opened a rapid fire on the dim figure in the distance.

The proprietor of the Old Home was so disturbed by the stirring events of the evening closing for the night. Scarcely was the last shutter barred when there came a soft rapping beneath the trap-door leading to the cellar. Then the door was cautiously forced upward, and the smiling face of Mister Jake appeared above the floor.

"Great Gosh! is that you?" gasped Meagher.

"The same," was the reply.

"And isn't it you they are tryin' to run down?"

"No; it's one of the Indians. Now feel my pockets and see if you can't find a key for these irons. I think the deputy put it there when he was looking for treat money." "The deputy?"

"Hurry, please."

With trembling hands Meagher fumbled through the pockets until he discovered the object of his search.

"Now use it," suggested Jake.

The key was inserted in the lock of the handcuffs and they dropped to the floor with a crash. Then the leg-irons received attention. and Mister Jake was a free man.

"Anything else, sir?" the proprietor inquired in quaking tones.

"Yes," said Mr. Jake, "give me your revolver and a sharp knife. Bury these irons in the cellar. Go at once and tell Miss Monica, the school-teacher, to meet me at Fenler's "Y' see," he began, "whiskey was bein' run Springs; she'll find horses there. We have to get out of Neosho tonight. Now tell me where to find Budd Spurr."

"He's over at Dutch Johann's with the rest of the crowd. But Mister Jake, you-you won't

"O. I won't kill him."

"I didn't mean him. It's the woman-she's lady."

Mister Jake grew suddenly grave, and there was a look in his face that few had ever seen. "God bless you, my friend," he said, slowly; 'she is a lady-and she is-my wife-has been for ten years." Meagher grasped Mister Jake's hand in a vise-like grip.

"Now keep silent," continued Mister Jake, 'and you'll never regret it. In this business I have a partner-Pryor, agent for the Cherokee Nation. Bud Spurr found out what I was doing and informed. The law had to take its course-to a certain extent. The deputy was one of Pryor's men. We had this affair all arranged before the arrest; only the little tableau on the table wasn't down on the programme. Now, my friend, good-by."

Taking the knife and revolver provided by Meagher, Mister Jake climbed down into the cellar, and thence, by way of a back door gained the street. A few moments later he walked into the little dive of Dutch Johann.

The crowd was so stunned by the sudden appearance of the late prisoner that they sat in silence, gaping at the smiling face before them. "I see I'm unexpected, boys," said Mister Jake.

Still there was no greeting.

"I won't disturb you a moment," he continued. "I have a little business to settle before leaving you for good.—Bud Spurr, stand up!"

As Mister Jake pushed a revolver in Spurr's face, there was no room for argument. Bud stood up.

"Did you inform on me?" demanded Mister Jake.

"N-no-"

"Don't you try to lie to me."

"Well, I did, then," said Spurr, with a sudden air of bravado. The hammer of the revolver clicked twice. "You're not goin' to murder me!" cried Spurr, his face turning white as death. "No," said Mister Jake, "O no! You look bad though, Bud. I'm afraid you're goin' to be awful sick. How's your pulse? Put out your tongue, I say!" A loud laugh broke from the crowd as Bud Spurr slowly stuck out his tongue like a sick child. There was a flash of bright steel, a tortured scream, and Bud Spurr sank to the floor, the red blood flowing from his mouth. "A little less tongue may add years to his life," remarked Mister Jake; and by the time the crowd comprehended just what had occurred, the man of the smiling face was embracing his wife at Fenler's Spring. 2

Grace Helen's Kernels of Corn.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY GEORGE ALEXANDER.

ZRO Pearsons put his head in at the kitchen door of the farmhouse.

"I'm going to hitch up to go to mill, mother," he said. "Have you got any errands down to the village you want me to do?"

"Take Grace Helen's letters to the Post Office and mail them," Mr. Pearsons' wife replied from the pantry, where she was making pies. She spoke indistinctly, owing to the fact that she had been earthen bowlful of mincemeat to see if it was properly seasoned. When she could speak more plainly she added the information: "The letters are on the mantel shelf, right beside the clock."

Mr. Pearsons came into the room to get the letters.

"For the land sakes, mother," he exclaimed, when he had taken them down from the shelf, "what has that girl got in these letters? They're as fat as if they'd swallowed a toad, every one of them."

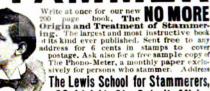

His wife came to the door of the pantry, her hands covered with flour. "It's only one of Grace Helen's notions," she said. "There's five grains of corn in each one of those letters. I thought you heard her 'ell last night that she was going to put them in."

"Corn?" cried Grace Helen's father, in wonder. "What on earth is she sending off corn in letters for. What kind of corn is it? 'Taint seed corn at this time of the year, I hope?"

"No, it sin't seed corn," his wife replied, laughing. "I told you it was one of her notions. Those are the letters inviting folks to Thanksgiving, and she put five kernels of corn in each invitation, because she said that was what the old Pilgrims used to do in remembrance of the famine they had, when Miles Standish, or somebody else, dealt them out five kernels of corn apiece, because it was all they could have. She got the idea that time she went home from school to spend Thanksgiving with that girl from Rhode Island."

Mr. Pearsons was "hefting" one of the letters in his hand. "I bet a cent," he said, "I'll

His wife had returned to her pies in the pantry. She came to the door again to answer his last question. "That is that dressmaker in Boston that Grace Helen was talking about. The one who has got a lame sister. Grace Helen says they live in just one room and a closet, up two flights of stairs, and do their cooking over a kerosene stove. The one who can walk goes out to work some, but the other stays to home all of the time and sews. Grace Helen says they do beautiful work. Some of the girls at school found them. They made a dress for her, the way she got acquainted with them. She has invited them to come and stay two weeks, because they wouldn't hardly feel as if they ought to go to the expense of the car fare just for a day or two; and for fear they wouldn't come she wrote that it would be a real favor to us if they would come and stay long enough to do some work for us. Of course we shall pay them, and they can use our machine. Grace Helen has got her new woolen dress to make up for winter, and a skirt, and I'm going to have them make over my black cashmere,-I might as well,- and I shouldn't wonder but what there might be some others here would want work done. Goodness knows ever since Annette Stillings got married it's been just about impossible to get anybody here to even look at a dress, much less make one."

Mr. Pearsons had helped himself to a warm doughnut from a panful, freshiy fried, which sat on the kitchen table. He sat on the edge of the woodbox to eat it. "Grace Helen is a good girl," he said. "I'm glad they're coming. But I wish I'd known about that corn, so's to have picked out a good bright ear. I'm afraid she got them kernels off of a nubbin."

When he had finished eating the doughnut the farmer put the letters in his coat pocket and went to the village.

From the time Grace Helen had been named to the time when she had grown to be a young woman and had gone away to school, the neighbors had said of her parents, "They'll spoil that child just as sure as the world; you see if they don't."

"Why under the sun don't they give her a sensible name, such as Maria, or Sarah," the critics had said, years before, when the baby was named; and then when they had learned that the baby's mother had not only named her Grace Helen, but proposed to call her by both the pretty names, they found new cause for disapproval. When the child had outgrown the district school, and the village academy and had gone away to a woman's college, the neighbors said: "They'll just make her unsettled. She won't never be contented to come back here and settle down to live to home."

In this, though, they had been mistaken Not only did Grace Helen love her father and mother and her home so well that she was happier at home than anywhere else, but she came to have a very decided opinion that if she hankered after a "career." one opened for her at home as plainly as anywhere else. When she had been at school some of the girls in her class had helped sustain the work of a "house settlement" in one of the crowded quarters of Boston. One day just after she had returned from a long visit home, and was talking over with the girls new plans for the settlement work, she exclaimed, "I tell you what, girls, I've made up my mind to one thing. It isn't necessary to go into the slums of the city to find chances to work. There's work enough in country towns, just like the one where I live. I don't mean just such work as we do here, but work enough, to try to help people there make their lives broader and better and more helpful to other people. I don't mean all of them. but some. When I get through school I'm going to settle down right at home, and begin a social settlement there."

The girls had laughed, at the time. They had not thought she meant what she said, nor had she felt quite sure, herself, when she was talking, but afterwards, when she had really finished school and gone home, the idea had returned to her with new force, and now she was gradually working it out, although so unobtrusively that no one of those in the New Hampshire town where she lived, who had felt its influence, would have been able to say what it was which had made life brighter during the last year and a half.

The minister had said to his wife once, speaking of Grace Helen, "It is a great help to have another such bright mind in the congregagation. The close attention with which she follows what I am saying is a great help to me when I am speaking." And, all unconsciously, he took more pains to prepare his sermons. The meetings of the Christian Endeavor Society were brightened by her suggestions, and those of the sewing society enlivened by her presence. While she had lived in Boston she had many opportunities to see and hear famous speakers and writers. She had an entertaining way of describing these people, and of repeating the things which she had heard them My. More than one member of that circle

TAKING CHANCES.

People Who Will Learn Only by a Perilous Personal Experience.

As a rule experience is profitable only to the individual who obtains it. When the aged man tries to save youth from mistakes such as he made, the youth smiles to himself: "The idea of that old fossil thinking that an up-to-date young man is going to make mistakes." It is a peculiar trait of human nature that each man thinks he is a little smarter than the others. and that he will succeed where others failed. "Oh, yes," says Smith, "I know that poor Jones got capsized in the rapids, but Jones, you know, never was a good hand at the paddle. It's a pity people like Jones will take such chances." And he smilingly launches his carroe to follow Jones alike in his feat and his

THE EXTREME OF FOLLY.

The most foolhardy man who ever risked his life, or the most infatuated gambler who ever risked his fortune, is a sage compared with the man who attempts to get the best of Nature. The foolhardy man may succeed. The gambler may win. But the man who takes chances with Nature is bound to lose. If the obituaries of tens of thousands who are cut down annually in life's prime were truly written death would not be attributed to this or that form of disease, but to an attempt to evade the necessary laws of The weak apot in the modern man is his stomach. It is in disease of the stomach that many of the maladies begin which carry off the busy men of the day. The seed of disease once planted in the stomach grows and spreads like some climbing parasite about a tree. It throws out a tendril about the heart and presently another which grips the lungs, and others again which take hold of kidneys and liver. Then suddenly the man is smitten by heart disease or lung disease; or succumbs to some malady of kidneys or liver. The real seat of disease is the stomach. And one of the reasons why the diseases of the other organs often fail of a cure is that the treatment ignores the stomach, and attempts to treat directly the other organs, whose diseases are only symptoms of disease of the stomach and the other organs of digestion and nutrition.

THERE'S PLENTY OF PROOF of the soundness of the proposition that diseases of other organs remote from the stomach which are caused by disease of the stomach must be cured through the stomach, and, in fact, cannot be cured in any other way. The best proof in the world is that Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, a stomach and blood medicine in particular, cures diseases of heart, lungs, liver, kidneys, etc., by curing diseases of the stomach and digestive and nutritive systems.

"For six long years I suffered with my liver, kidneys, and indigestion, which baffled the best doctors in our country," writes Mr. E. L. Ransell, of Woolsey, Prince William Co., Va. "I suffered with my stomach and back for a long time and after taking a quantity of medicine from three doctors, I grew so bad I could hardly do a day's work. Would have deathlike pains in the side, and blind spells, and thought life was hardly worth living. I decided to consult Dr. R. V. Pierce and his staff of physicians. They said my case was curable and I was greatly encouraged. I began taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets,' as advertised. Before I had taken half of the second bottle I began to feel relieved. I got six more bottles and used them, and am happy to say I owe my life to Dr. Pierce and his medicines. These words are truths, as I live, so if this testimonial can be used in any way to be of benefit you need not hesitate to use it. I shall stand for the Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute as long as life leate "

DON'T DELAY.

Disease never leaps on a man like a lion from ambush and strikes him down at a blow However suddenly a man may be stricken and however deadly the disease, the time was when it was a little thing, easy of control. If you are suffering from indigestion, dyspepsia, or any form of stomach "trouble," don't put off the proper treatment. "Golden Medical Discovery" will cure diseases of the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition at any stage. but the cure will be quicker the earlier it is the pain that I endured before I commenced taking Dr. Pierce's medicine. I was not able to do anything at all. Could not eat anything except bread and tea-or if I did the top of my head hurt so it seemed it would kill me; with all that I could do it would burn like fire, but now since taking 'Golden Medical Discovery' I can eat a little of almost anything I want and can do a good day's work as well as anybody can. Am better than I have been for years. I think your medicine is the best that ever was made, for it is the only thing that ever did me any good. I tried many other kinds, but none did me any good but your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and 'Favorite Prescription.' I can never praise them too highly to any one who suffers as I did."

"For twelve long months I suffered untold

The city seamstress and her sister came the Saturday before Thanksgiving. Grace Helen and her father went to the station to meet them with a comfortable two-seated carriage. When they reached home the farmer lifted the lame girl out in his arms and carried her into the house. The big comfortable farmhouse, the good home-cooked food, and the crisp November country air combined to make a new world for the city girls.

"I don't wonder it seems good to them," Mrs. Pearsons told her husband privately, "after living and eating and sleeping in one room and a closet."

The next week both visitors borrowed big aprons and worked in the kitchen, helping get ready for the Thanksgiving dinner. The one who was lame sat in a rocking chair and seeded raisins. The other helped Mrs. Pearsons cook, trembling at times to see the farmer's wife dish out butter and sugar, and break fresh eggs.

Meanwhile they learned about the other guests who were coming to help keep the day. John's family, and Amasa's, and Maria, who was a widow with no children, and Elam Peterson, who, Mrs. Pearsons explained, "is a sort of elbow cousin of mine, who hasn't any near relations of his own."

After Thanksgiving week there was a week another and after ewing and then still another, for the women of the neighborhood came bringing work to be done.

The result of it was that at the end of a month the dressmaker went back to Boston alone, to give up their one room there and pack what little furniture they had to be freighted to the New Hampshire town. The farmer and Grace Helen helped them to furnish a comfortable little tenement in the village, on the front of which, in time, a modest sign announced their occupation. Work came to them in plenty, and health and happiness in such measure as they had never before known, while they, in time, were able to give their share of help and pleasure to the country people.

One day the farmer, waiting for his daughter in the dressmaker's sitting-room, saw hanging on the wall a tiny glass vial tied with a blue ribbon to a card on which a date had been painted in gilt. Inside the vial were five golden grains of corn.

"What's that?" he asked, pointing to the card.

"That is the corn—the five kernels of corn-house." the lame seamstress said, adding, "we keep them for remembrance, and because of the good which has come to us by means of them."

The farmer had bent over to look at the bottle closely. "Yes," he said, as he straightened up, "Grace Helen did use good seed, after

NE day, about fortyfour years ago, I was sitting on my stoop wondering how in the world to raise a couple of hundred dollarson nothing save some waste land to the north of my little farm, when a stranger rode up and solved the problem in less time than it takes to tell it.

"Your land isn't worth a d-but I want all I can get of it for $500", said the stranger, and it didn't take me long to sign the papers and give to him deeds which made over to him considerably more than half I possessed. My $500 cash for a time compensated for my regret at losing this rocky little stretch of land which, however useless, had from associations and memory become dear to me. And I hurried away to Butte City (a distance of about 60 miles northward), to drown sentiment and forget.

It was not until two weeks later, on my return, that I had a chance to repent at leisure when I learned that this stranger was fairly coining money on my lands. Had he been a man even my own equal in physique I could have borne the thought with more grace. But he, a lame man, hobbling around upon a crutch for support, had discovered in my earth the precious gold no one had dreamed existed in our section of Montana.

Miners from all the surrounding country were hastening our way, but the little cripple was shrewd and with the exception of men from the cities who meant to invest, not a soul was allowed to put so much as a foot within his border. His claim was that his land was on a vein, and was saturated, so to speak, with the precious metal. And bags and bags of earth were carted to the nearest railroad and shipped to Butte where it was examined and reported to be the richest ever assayed.

Then I began to scurry about, but not a particle of "the vein" touched the land I had left me, which was the first suspicion in the community that there was something savoring of a fraud, and finally a government inspector came our way and decided to investigate. All this time the little lame man was seen hobbling about instructing a gang of laborers on a tunnel he was digging down through toward the richest part of the land lying "nearest the vien", so he expressed it. The inspector, as we afterward learned was sent from parties in the East who had heard of this "find" and had decided to buy the entire land of the cripple provided he would ship to them twenty-five bags of earth taken from different places where the inspector chose to dig it himself, and if it proved as rich by half as the owner claimed, they would give him $50,000 and close the bargain.

That was an exciting day for all who were interested, for we not only doubted, but were positive the whole thing was a carefully devised plot to swindle. The inspector furnished his own bags so that nothing could be wrong with those, and not until they were filled and tied and on the platform ready for shipment did the owner even see them, but just as the rein ceme in he drove un end good leg around them he counted and sounded each by a tap with his crutch, and in his miserly way chuckled to himself and hopped off.

The next week was one of suspense, for there was delay and we had been assured the man would either be arrested or paid his fifty thousand dollars within a few days, and I was anxious to get my little farm together again and thus, I must confess, I greedily foresaw the stranger in prison and my five hundred dollars clear gain.

But, wonder of wonders, the bags were declared unsurp, ingly rich, the gold being found in marveious quantities scattered through the dirt. The money was sent immediately, and before the purchasers could reach the spot the stranger had gone, just as silently as he had come. Within a few days a little city had sprung up around us and with the newcomers and the capital, prosperity, for a change. looked us in the face. But this was of short duration. The next shipment of bags was declared absolutely worthless, containing nothing but mother earth—and so our boom and wealth all disappeared and more than one disappointcongratulated herself on the fact that "we misery," writes Mrs. Mollie Colgate, Randolph, never talk goesip in our ladies' society," with- Charlotte Co., Va. promise reverted to me and until yesterday no one had ever solved the mystery of those twenty-five bags of gold.

Many believed that the cripple was possessed of some demoniac powers, but I always felt there was more trickery than witchery in the transaction, and as I stumbled around in the ruins of the little hut where he used to live I found underneath a broken board in the floor an old norm-eaten crutch and beside it were an old worm-eaten crutch and beside it were numerous small empty bottles labelled Bi-chloride of Gold. This meant little to me for a moment until, on examination, I found the crutch contained a tube opening into a needle point in the bottom, and at the part of the crutch where the hand rests a bulb-like arrangement concealed by the cross supporting bar of the crutch.

Then the cripple's behavior on the depot platform came back to me and I recalled that what seemed merely a tap as he pretended to count each bag, probably was a movement which inserted the needle point (or the foot of the crutch) into the bag of dirt, and pressing the bulb squirted into it this solution of gold which was assayed so pure.

CRIP CHASE'S THANKSGIVING.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY BRINKTON MEARS.

ESTLED among the hills of Northern Vermont is a lake that is noted for miles about for its excellent fishing. The lake is long and narrow and there is evidence that at one time there was a dam near the center that divided it into two smaller lakes or ponds, ridges of sand and stone appearing here and there when the water is lowest in midsummer. The story of this dam and its subsequent removal forms an interesting chapter of rural New England life, quick temper and final softening of hearts.

Christopher Chase, or Crip, as he was commonly called, and Jonathan Haskell owned the land joining this lake and consequently owned jointly the waters of the lake. Here they had fished together for forty years, frequently in the same boat or within hailing distance of each other, ready to hold up an extra sized fish when secured. The rupture in their friendly relations finally came as a result of words over the proposed selling of permits to fish on the lake. A sportsman from the city had whispered a suggestion to Crip that favorably impressed the farmer and that very night he broached the subject to his neighbor Has-

"I won't be party to sellin' no permits for fishin' in the lake," said Jonathan, lighting his pipe, "there's good fishin' there now and I want it to continue. We've been friends and mighty close ones, too, for nigh onto fifty year, Crip, but I put my foot down fair and square agin this foolishness."

agin this foolishness."
"Well, by hemlock," said Crip at length, bringing his fist down on the table with a mighty thump, "if ye won't agree to it I'll run a dam across where my land j'ines yourn and run my half to suit myself."
"And if ye do I'll sue ye," roared Jonathan, springing to his feet, "I'll sue ye, if it takes my bottom dollar."
The following day, true to his word, Crip bottom dollar."

The following day, true to his word, Crip Chase began work on the proposed dam, hauling gravel and stone from a great gravel pit located on his farm. It was slow work and it is altogether probable that Crip would have tired of it and given it up were it not for the fact that each load showed Jonathan that Crip meant just what he said when he threatened to build the dam, and to give up would have seemed like a voluntary yielding to his neighbor.

Meanwhile Jonathan brought suit for damages, alleging that the dam marred the landscape and that the best ground for fishing was at Crip's end of the lake, both of which assertions were perfectly true. Aired in the courts, however, the case went against Jonathan and the dam was pushed forward with renewed vigor until completed.

Finally Crip took steps to stock his pond with trout and two years from the time when the trout were first introduced he advertised, tional boats were built and it was no uncommon sight to see half a dozen fishermen on the water at one time. The fishing continued excellent and there was every promise of the venture proving a remunerative one.

It was now all of three years since Chase and Haskell had spoken to each other; frequently they passed on the road, but one or the other would whip up his horse if driving, or quicken the steps if walking, the while puffing away at their pipes like steam engines. What was Crip's surprise therefore, to see Jonathan pull up his horse one August morning and remark the fine weather and general condition of the the fine weather and general condition of the

"There are sizable fish in your pond by this time, I take it," said Jonathan, looking keenly at his neighbor.

"At times there are good ones hooked, responded Crip, "come over and try your luck, John, you're welcome to any of the boats."

"Maybe I will." said Jonathan, "though

A week had not elapsed since the meeting and conversation on the road, when a fisherman returned to the house one morning after being out less than an hour, his rod broken and tackle ruined.

"The best thing you can do is to rid your confounded pond of a shark," said he, wrathfully addressing Crip, "there's a fish sporting out there that weighs a hundred pounds if he weighs an ounce. He has broken a twenty dollar rod for me."

dollar rod for me."

Crip had pondered long over Jonathan's affability, and with the learning of the presence of a large fish that snapped the best tackle as though it were a pipestem, light began to break—Jonathan, biding his time for revenge, had managed to introduce some great fish to the waters of his neighbor's pond—that was the thought that came to Crip.

Other reports of the great fish came in, more rods were demolished and sportsmen raged, but it was not until late in the fall that Crip had an opportunity to fish for the creature that snapped all tackle, slaughtered smaller fish and generally terrorized the denizens of the pond.

fish and generally terrorized the denizens of the pond.

All through the fore part of November Crip trolled the pond with a stout pole, a multiplying reel paying out a hundred feet or more of the strongest line obtainable. It was not until just before Thanksgiving, however, that success attended his efforts to allure the great fish to take the hook.

Crip was paddling leisurely across the pond one morning, remarking to himself the unusual fact of the winter holding off and no ice forming, though it was but a day to Thanksgiving, when of a sudden the reel began to pay out line with exceeding rapidity, and an instant later, a hundred feet or more astern of the canoe, a fish, the largest by far that he had ever seen, leaped out of water, endeavoring to dislodge the fatal hook.

Dropping the paddle, Crip seized the rod and began to reel in the line as rapidly as possible, recovering some forty feet before the fish changed his course. Though Crip was an expert with the rod, in less than ten seconds it had snapped under the severe strain, and Crip found himself holding onto the line, the hooked fish making straight for deep water, and the canoe flying across the pond as though run by an electric motor. Crip had not the slightest idea what the end of this novel chase would be, but come what would he was determined that he would hold on and land his fish if it were a possible thing. Little by little he gathered in the line, the while trying his best to keep his balance and prevent an overturning of the canoe.

About thirty feet from the farther shore was a bar where the water was less than three feet deep. It was just above this bar that the fish, realizing the regress of the shore made a

There was no doubt in Crip's mind as to the one who had promoted the scheme for ruining the fishing in his pond, but now that the danger was over, far from desiring to widen the breech between the two families, realizing that he himself had unduly incensed his neighbor, he determined to bring about if possible a return of the old feeling of friendliness and good turn of the old feeling of friendliness and good fellowship.
Crops this year had proved practically a failure and not a few farmers in the state were obliged to see their properties seized by the rapacious money-lenders. Others were living from hand to mouth, hoping that things would take a better turn when the winter had passed. Among the latter was Jonathan Haskell and his family.

Among the latter was Jonathan Haskell and his family.

Crip took the old path across the fields, now wellnigh obliterated, to Jonathan's homestead, having changed his dripping garments for dry ones, well knowing the tight place in which his neighbor was wedged through the failure of crops and aware that Thanksgiving would be a dreary day for him.

Jonathan was at work at the chopping-block when Crip arrived.

"I come over to see if you wouldn't eat Thanksgiving dinner along with us," said Crip, laying his hand on Jonathan's arm, "we're going to have a critter for dinner that would feed forty folks."

Jonathan's face lighted up with a look akin to joy, but he did not trust himself to speak for a moment.

"We'll come, Crip, if—if you want us," said he at length, "Amos is coming home to-morrow, and I was just thinkin' that there wasn't no turkey and no nothin' except potatoes and corn head."

The following day when his guests had arrived, Crip threw open the door to the brick oven.

"See here, Jonathan," said he, "how's that for a turkey? caught it in the pond yesterday— a Mascalonge, weighs sixty-seven pounds." Three times Jonathan attempted to speak, but each time his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth.

"Not a word, John," said Crip, "that fish

"You're hard pushed just now, John," said Crip, backing up against the door so that no one could enter, "and what do you say to having the dam removed? the water is low and neither of us can do much other work; it will mean twelve dollars a week to you. Another spring we will go into the selling of permits on the half and half basis."

"Be sure and not set anything on fire with that candle," she added.

The rest of the company said various things, and Bob, the boy who was the seventh son of a seventh son, was the recipient of numerous unsolicited suggestions.

"Set the candle on the hanging shelf," said Aunt Emmeline, "and then stand in the darkest corner and hold the glass so that the light will shine over your shoulder." "And see a goose," interpolated one of Bob's brothers.

"So I surely will," retorted Bob, "when you look over my shoulder."

"Bobby dear won't need any candle to light up the glass when he looks in it to see Gertrude's future husband," said Anna, my fiance's younger sister; and this made them all laugh at me, for my hair is as nearly flame color as it is possible for anybody's hair to be.

So they went down the cellar stairs, alone, one after the other, and came back with vary-one after the other, and came back with varying reports. As a general thing, though, the coats fitted, for Bobby was a quick-witted boy and knew his family's foibles.

Edward, his oldest brother, looked decidedly self-conscious when he came up and the report which floated up after him was, "I couldn't make out anything, so many faces floated across the glass;" for Edward was notoriously fickle. Anna came up beaming. "He said he saw a marble house, and a yacht, and trips to Europe, and diamonds, and dresses, and a handsome husband who will be good to me," she said.

"You'll do Bobby's mending after this, to pay for that, I hope," was Anna's sister's comment.

Then came my turn to go. "We'll hold Ger-

Then came my turn to go. "We'll hold Gertrude back, so she can't creep down and peep over your shoulder," said two of Gertrude's brothers—there were seven of them—"so you can have a fair chance."

I went laughingly down the stairs. The light of the candle set high on the hanging shelf made the cellar a picture of brown shades and deep shadows which a Dutch artist would have loved to paint. In the coolest corner were the cider barrels, rolled side by side, and on shelves over them dozens of glass cans of fruit. A bin of potatoes and one of apples were near together, and there was a smell of pickles and peppers in the air.

Bobby stood in the far corner, holding the looking glass in front of him, his back towards me. I crept up to him softly, for it was a condition of the test that he must not know whose fortune he was to tell until he saw the face in the glass.

At last I stood behind him. An instant later At last I stood behind him. An instant later a cry rang through the cellar so sharp and awful that it silenced the talk and laughter of the people in the rooms above and brought them frightened to see what was the matter. The boy had fallen senseless on the cellar bottom, breaking the mirror against the stone wall as he fell. The light of the candle shone back from a dozen fragments of broken glass scattered on the ground.

We carried him upstairs and laid him on a lounge in the sitting-room. Some one said "go for a doctor!" but his mother and his aunt said "no, not yet. Perhaps we may not need one; and bathed his head and cared for him themselves. Soon, beneath their hands, he shivered and then began to talk, faintly, but plainly enough so that we could distinguish every word.

"The storm grows thicker," he said. "Can no one turn the steamer back? This awful cold!" and shuddered again. "The cruel wind!—God help—help—help—their souls!"

That was the first Thanksgiving after Gertrude and I were engaged, and I had gone with her to keep the festival at the home of her Aunt Emmeline. Gertrude's aunt lived in the Aunt Emmeline. Gertrude's aunt lived in the old house in Scituate, which had been the home of the family for generations. It was one of those great square houses, with huge chimneys and many fireplaces, which the prosperous farmer-fishermen who lived on Cape Cod built before the Revolution. The rooms were big enough to put a modern cottage inside any one of them, and the hammer and saw of the carpenter had been allowed to touch the old house only to add to it the conveniences of modern life, without altering its appearance.

Aunt Emmeline was older than Gertrude's father. She had never married and had always lived in the old home,—with a man and his wife to do the work for her—keeping open house for all the children and grandchildren during the vacation season, and, so they all said, maintaining a hospital for any of the relations who needed change of air and a gen-relations who needed change of air and a general bracing up.

Thanksgiving was always kept at Aunt Emmeline's home; and there would be a houseful there, for besides Gertrude's father's family, in which there were ten boys and girls, there were other nieces and nephews.

That was the way the evening's fortune tell-

That was the way the evening's fortune telling had begun. Gertrude's seven brothers had lain down in a row on the floor, heads touching heels, and the line stretching from one cor-ner of the big room to the opposite corner, "to see what a string of boys pa and ma have got," as one of the boys had said. Then some one had called Bobby the seventh; and the old superstition had been commented on. Then had transpired, what none of the younger members of the family had known, that if four members of the family had known, that if four tiny graves, whose headstones had crumbled now for many years in the old Scituate grave-yard were to be counted, Bobby himself was the mystic seventh son of a seventh son. Then some one had proposed the trial with the mirror. The older ones half-laughing, half-protesting, had allowed it, and Aunt Emmeline had brought a looking glass with a queer fret-sawed frame, an heirloom of her grandfather's.

Now they blamed themselves. "Poor boy!"

Now they blamed themselves. "Poor boy!" his aunt said, as she put camphor on his head. "It was too great a strain." Bobby was only fifteen. "I ought not to have let him do it." After a time the boy opened his eyes, and sat up, looking around him in a dazed way. "What is the matter?" he asked.

He was quite himself, then, only weak, but he could remember nothing of what had happened in the cellar after Anna had come up, nor did he know anything of what he had said after we had laid him upon the lounge.

But we tried no more experiments in fortune telling, that night, and I, for one, after I had gone to bed, lay awake for a long time to listen to the boom of the breakers coming in across Massachusetts Bay to beat up the Scituate beach.

That was in 1898. Thanksgiving that year came November 30th, the last Thursday in the month. I was to start the following Saturday for a long trip "down East," into Maine and the provinces. My sample trunks were packed, ready for the transfer company's wagon to come for them, and my passage was already booked. booked.

ready for the transfer company's wagon to come for them, and my passage was already booked.

I had always told my friends that one reason why I had been attracted to Gertrude was because she was so sensible. Of course some of them had smiled at this, in an aggravating way, and said, "There are others;" as if I thought I was the only man and Gertrude the only woman of commonsense in the world.

But the day after Thanksgiving Gertrude came to me, just before I was to start to go back to Boston, and put her arms about my neck and asked me to give up my December trip, or at least to put it off for a while.

I told her I could not possibly do either; and after I had talked with her for a little, she showed that what I had said of her was true, for she kissed me and said, "Go, if you think best, Francis; but oh! please let me hear from you often, for I shall worry so about you in spite of all that I can do."

I don't think that I could tell, even now, whether it was the recollection of that one awful cry of fear, there in the cellar, which made me do it, but Saturday, after I had mailed Gertrude a long cheerful letter telling her not to worry about me, I followed it up with a telegram saying that I would leave Boston that night by train instead of by boat.

If I had not I should not have told this story; for I was booked to go on the Portland, and every one who remembers the terrible storm which began Saturday night knows how that steamer went out or port that evening to disappear with all on board her.

Do you ask me, because I tell this story, if I think that fore-knowledge is possible? If you do I answer that I do not know. I only know that I am here to tell the story.

THE PASSION PLAY OF 1900.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

N a level plateau at the foot of the Bavarian Alps, and within two miles of the point where the watershed sends the rivers down toward Munich, lying nearly one hun-dred miles away, is the little Tyrolean village of O ber Ammergau, which has received this received this year unusual attention from the fact that the only Passion Play which is allowed by the Roman Catholic Church was performed there and filled the village with crowds of tourists, largely American, who flocked thither to witness the most stupendous play of this kind ever attempted.

presenting in a theatrical way the Saviour of mankind is frowned upon by all intelligent people, and an attempt to bring out the Passion Play in New York City met with such disapprobation that the scheme was abandoned. Even in that magnificent spectacle of Ben Hur, the instinct against sacrilege was so strong that Christ himself never appears in the play even at the time of the miracles, but His presence is made known by electric light effects, combined with touching, religious music.

The idea of sacrilege, however, in such theatrical presentations has not always obtained in men's minds; and throughout the Middle Ages the Holy Church encouraged what were called men's minds; and throughout the Middle Ages the Holy Church encouraged what were called mysteries or miracle plays. These were generally what would now be considered caricatures of holy subjects, and were performed in a crude and rude sort of a way in booths or on platforms at plays and in all kinds of public assemblages. The present Passion Play is but an outcome of these mysteries, and until a comparatively recent date was played in the same coarse and ridiculous way. Until recomparatively recent date was played in the same coarse and ridiculous way. Until reformed, it was customary to have the traitor Judas suicide on the stage, and his bowels gushing forth were formed into sausages which were distributed by the High Priest to the hungry crowd in waiting. So far from being the solemn and impressive entertainment that it is now, it was a mixture of religious superstition and amusement. stition and amusement.

The world owes the present wonderful Passion Play to a vow taken by the inhabitants of this little Bavarian town immediately after Europe had been devastated by the Thirty Years' War. The country had been swept by opposing armies for years, and death, burning and pillage had been on every side. Peace was and pillage had been on every side. Peace was followed by that most dreaded epidemic, the black death, which swept over Europe, carrying away thousands and thousands of her already decimated population. Those that were able to flee from the infected towns to places of safet y would do so. It so happened that in one city where the plague was viru-lent, a prominent inhabitant of Ober Ammergau was tran-sacting some busi-ness. His Schuchler, and with his wife he was sojourning in a German city. At the outbreak of the plague in this city they returned, without letting the inhabitants know that they had been where the black death was. They brought the infection with them, and in thirty-three days number of foreigners, but it was reserved for eighty-four persons in this little town had died. Hemmed in by the mountains, with no prospect of relief, they gathered in a church to world. It has been made familiar by literature, lectures, and many other ways during the past seek Divine help, and there made the vow that so long as the village remained, if God would take away the plague, they would perform the miracle play for the world's benefit every ten

Never was a vow more quickly answered, for it is related that death immediately stopped and that the sick were restored to health. From that time until the present the play has been given decennially, the only interruptions having been caused by the wars which have prevalled in Europe, the last interruption of this kind being in 1870 when, at the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, the then Christus was taken down from the cross, placed in uniform and joined his company of Bavarian artillery to fight the French.

It is difficult to understand, unless one has been into the village itself, how thoroughly the entire thoughts of the community are connected with this Passion Play. One of the gights of the village is the number of cows which every night come down from the mounsights of the village is the number of cows which every night come down from the mountain pasture lands into the village to be milked to supply the demands of the visitors. Upon each is a tinkling bell and at this hour the whole village is filled with a melody of sound. There is a most intense rivalry and ambition among the inhabitants of the village for parts in the play itself. Nearly five hundred appear at one time in costume, and from their merest infancy they are taught that the highest work they could do in life is to successfully take part in the play. The local government is most democratic and is run mainly in relation to a successful production of the next play. The house-holders elect the Burgermeister and Council. The Parish Priest and six others, called the Passion Committee, with those elected, form the government of the village. The nominations for the present year took place last December, and caused much rivalry throughout the village. In 1890, it was expected that Peter Rendl, the John of that year, would be the Christus in the play; but it was necessary that Christus should have a flowing beard, which Rendl's refused to become with advancing age, so that this year he again acted John which is the only important part except that of Judas taken by the same actor as in the cast ten years ago. John Meyer the Christus of 1870-1, 1880 and 1890, was too old and his beard too grizzled for the performance of that part this year, although he was too old and his beard too grizzled for the performance of that part this year, although he was strongly supported by the villagers. Since May the former Burgermeister has died and Meyer has assumed that office. He was prominent this year in the play as leading the chorus and reciting the Prologue, which is considered the honorary assignment for those who have grown too old for the more youthful parts. There was much rivalry this year, as the older school villagers desired to have a veteran actor for the part of Christus; but the committee decided that Anton Lang, who is only twenty-five years of age, should take the principal part. These actors all do manual labor, and one of their greatest sources of income is the sale of articles made by themselves to travelers.

one of their greatest sources of income is the sale of articles made by themselves to travelers. They work in wood, clay, and fabrics, and have many ways of turning an honest penny. Lang is a potter, and his father, who acts as Herod, does the same work. They live in a white house opposite the theater. Rendl has a shop of his own and sells exquisite carving both by himself and by other important players.

Throughout the village are seen these long haired actors, and they are pointed out by the villagers and their friends as such and such a character, either in the play this year, or as one who has won renown in some character in the past decades. In fact, but very few of the princi-pal personages of the village are disconnected in the mind of the traveler at any time from the characters which they bear in the play itself; so that one always refers to having purchased this or that from so and so who was such character in play was pro-duced in the open fields. In the course of time a stage was erected, and from this has gradually evolved the present theatre. It is unlike the theatres that we naturally have in our minds, being open to the elements, and until this year unroofed. There was no scenery in the back of the theatre, the view of the distant mountains forming what is supposed to be the view to-ward Jerusalem. Being in a mountainous country, there are many sudden and severe showers, and much cold. Sometimes it is necessary for the audience to carry with them blankets and other bed clothing to wrap around in > the coats and wraps which they naturally carry, and it is seldom that the need of extra cloth-ing is not felt even in bright days. It must

To return to the theatre:

The hall holds four thousand seats, or six hundred less than in 1890, and by a clever arrangement visitors cannot stay anywhere except in the village. The tickets for the tickets for the play are issued only in connec-tion with the rooms in the village; that is to say, you have to order both which is decided by the Passion Committee. Most of the stage is open to the rain and sun, and stands framed in a background of green hills and blue sky; but the auditorium is entirely covered over by huge iron girders, in the form of a gigantic arch, and on these girders boards are fastened. These are covered with canvas painted yellow, which at a distance looks like stone, but the illusion vanishes as you approach. It is a curious fact that the covering over the auditorium caused much adverse criticism, as taking away from the distinctive character of the performance.

In addition to the ticket system, which compels all people to stop at Ober Ammergau, the railway from Munich has practical monopoly, except for the few odd-looking vehicles which come in from neighboring towns, and which of thems selves are a source of great interest to the tourist. The train leaves Munich at four A. M., arriving in time for the commencement of the performance, which is at eight A. M.

of the performance is eight hours, there being an intermis-sion of an hour and a half for luncheon when it is about half through. It closes for the day at 5.30 P. M. These villagers are thrifty in the extreme, and recognize the value of a monopoly in the production of the Passion Play. It is said that production of the Passion Play. It is said that so strong have they become in influence political and financial, that they are able to pull strings which will prevent a reproduction in any country. Aside from all the religious character of the play, underneath everything is always in evidence the ability to make an honest dollar. The most rigid rules are enforced against cameras, kodaks, and even sketch books, as a monoply of these rights is given to companies which must be protected. No smoking is allowed within thirty yards and no person can stand up during the play. There no person can stand up during the play. There is the same desire to sell souvenirs, photographs. is the same desire to sell souvenirs, photographs, autographs, etc., which always characterizes any place of sight seeing, and additional interest is given to the articles sold in this case by the fact that the sellers are generally connected in person with the sight itself. Neither more nor less advantage is taken of the fact that there is always a good market for their wares than is taken in any other country; and while it is customary to believe these people saturated with the spirit of the Passion Play so that it shows out in their ordinary lives, it must be confessed that contact with them shows them to be as thoroughly alive to the value of the be confessed that contact with them shows them to be as thoroughly alive to the value of the dollar as would be the keenest Yankee.

It is impossible to tell in print the beauty of the play. It is bringing in realism the life of the Saviour, and placing you not in acquaintance with Him as a character in the New Testament, but real and vivid as a part of a crowd of Galileans around in Jerusalem, and as if you were actually taking part in the events of that time. One of the best English writers says of it as follows:

"Its human significance, for, thank God, we have at last seen Jesus as a man among men, a human being with no halo round his brow, no radiance not of this world marking him off apart from the rest of us his fellow-men, but simply Jesus the Galilean, gibbeted on the gallows of his time, side by side with the scum of mankind.

"And it was this story that transformed the world! "Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean!" Over how many tribes and nations and kindreds of men? On this very spot, by the side of the swift-flowing Ammer, what strange rites were being celebrated long centuries after the cry of victory over death burst from the lips of the Crucified, and yet here we stand today."

The acting is realism itself. It is difficult for the audience to restrain their passions at scenes in the play, and often the sound of moaning and sobbing will entirely drown the accents of the actor. The tableaux are realistic and intense and vivid in their coloring. The various emotions of the Jews, the brutality of the Roman soldiery, and the patient sweetness of Christ himself are marvelously reproduced.

Nothing in the whole history of Protestantism has ever shown to it the beauty of the group of Holy Women, whom, because others have incessantly worshipped, Protestants have been taught not to even contemplate. The most pathetic figure in the whole play is Mary, the Mother, who, next to the Christus, is the central figure. After her easily comes Mary the Magdalen, and through the whole play these two women stand out radiant as angels, and the true ideals of the womanhood of the world. While all the principal actors in this year's

Mrs. J. E. Jewett, of Metuchen, N. J., suffered for nearly half a century from rheumatism, and the manner in which she was cured is best told in her own words. She

" The pain was all in my knee joints and was at times almost unbearable. I was unable to go out of doors and could only hobble about the house with a cane.

I finally bought some of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and before I had used the first box I noticed an improvement. After I had taken two boxes I could walk without a cane, and went out of doors freely. Well, I continued using the pills and by the time I had taken thirty-six boxes I was entirely well, and suffered no pain at all.

much stage machinery is used, which is not visible to the audience; and this is very neces-sary, for at the crucifixion Christ is suspended from the cross for nearly half an hour, and fin-visible to the audience; and this is very necessary, for at the crucifixion Christ is suspended from the cross for nearly half an hour, and finally dies in extreme agony.

He really is supported by an iron corselet which is covered by his girdle and hooked to the cross. Certain scenes in the play, such as Christ sinking under the cross, and where the Roman soldiers place the crown of thorns upon his head, after which they press it on with an iron bar upon which they apparently bear their full weight, and the blood bursts from the forehead, are intense in agony. Where the side is pierced by the spear apparent blood flows down over the body, so that while actually holding to the detail of the passion, many stage effects are given which would do credit to a metropolitan theater. After each tableau concludes each special scene which has been acted and spoken, a gorgeously dressed chorus appears on the stage and in German song explains what is to follow in the next act. As the act commences, the chorus file off to left and right.

In conclusion, it is a remarkable fact to record that with all the crowds that have been to the village this year, the amount of criticism upon either accommodations, arrangements or the play itself has been too trivial to be noticed; and notwithstanding the fact that the audience has been composed every day of people gathered from the four quarters of the world, and representing all shades of religion and religious feeling, nothing but commendation has been heard of the play itself and the lessons that it teaches; and whoever has seen the play has come away with that feeling which comes to all that Christianity is real; that instead of being an abstract idea, the spectator has seen the realism and been a part of the time of Christ himself; and that in the play which he has witnessed, he has seen, vivid and bold, the actual production of that story which has transformed the world.

Men. Women and Things.

CONDUCTED BY JENNIE MELVENE DAVIS.

Count von Waldersee as the head of the allied forces in China, is a center of interest for the civilized world. His wife, who was Miss Mary Esther Lee of New York, has long been a brilliant figure in political and social circles of the old world. No American woman who has made an "international marriage" has eclipsed or even equalled the brilliant achievements of Countess Waldersee. Her father was a native of the Nutmeg state who made a fortune in the grocery business in New York. His widow and daughter went to live in Stuttgart, Germany, and the young American woman soon won a position in the best social circles of the city. There she met Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein, who fell desperately in love with the attractive young woman. He was seventy; she, twentysix. He renounced his title in order to wed the woman of his choice. They made a trip to the Holy Land and there six months after their marriage the Prince died, leaving to his young wife a fortune of $4,000,000. She was already a favorite with the Emperor and received the title in her own right of Princess von Noer. From that time she has been recognized as a powerful influence in German politics. The Empress of Germany is the niece of the Countess by her first marriage. The marriage of Prince William, now the Kaiser, with the Princess Augusta William is generally ascribed to the powerful influence of the Countess. She married Count von Waldersee two years after the death of her first husband. It is believed that the Countess aimed to oust Bismarck and secure the Imperial Chancellorship for von Waldersee, whose career up to the time of his marriage had been wholly military. She organized the first and last salon that Berlin has known, and here the enemies of Bismarck congregated. The young Emperor took every occasion to show his regard for the Countess and she is said to be the only woman that the Kaiser has ever listened to with serious attention. The Emperor never neglected an occasion to show friendship and consideration for the Waldersees and was daily at the Countess' side in the troubled times that followed the death of the old Emperor. The battle royal between Bismarck and the Waldersees is past history and although the Iron Chancellor triumphed in the end, the prominence gained by his rival has never been lost. The Countess is six years younger than the Field Marshall. Her hair is snowy white but she is still considered a very handsome woman. Charming, brilliant and sympathetic she is one of the most clever and most ambitious women in all Europe. Her success is not the common social success of the American heiress who marrics a title. On the contrary it is the individual success of a brilliant woman who has made her place in the world,-not marred it.

The three peace commissioners for China are Li Hung Chang whose personality is well known in America, Chang Chih Tung and Lui K'un ih. Li Hung Chang is one of the richest men in the world and Chang Chih Tung is poor. He has had the same opportunities that have made Earl Li wealthy but it is to his credit that he remains poor, for in China it proves him to the talented American woman but a jealousy honest. He governs Hu Kuang or the Suo Lake Province. He is restless, progressive and a thorough believer in China on one hand and in the necessity for the adoption of Western ideas on the other. He is sometimes called a proforeign Viceroy, but personally he hates the "foreign devils." He is clever and progressive enough to realize the necessity for the adoption of Western ideas of government, education and economic progress. He founds schools and colleges and the process shows how far he departs from the slow, dilatory methods of Chinese officials. He decided one day to found an agricultural college in his province and directed that his secretary should telegraph at once to America for the professors. His state papers are famous for their literary excellence. He is thoroughly honest in a nation of tricky foremost portrait painters of the day.

officials, courageous enough to criticise the throne and far sighted and comprehending enough to shape a safe policy for China if the authorities will permit. As one of the Peace Commissioners he has an opportunity to serve his nation well if there is cohesion enough in the government to preserve the idea of Imperial power, and sense enough to allow the Commissioners to save China as a nation.

Lieutenant Winston Churchill is to lecture in the United States during the present winter. He is the son of the late Lord Randolph Churchill and his mother has long been a brilliant figure in the social, political and literary life of London. Jennie Jerome was a well-known New York belle when she married Lord Randolph Churchill. Her recent marriage to Mr. Cornwallis West, who is younger than her eldest son, excited much interest. Winston Churchill is but twenty-five years old but he has already attained much fame and distinguished himself both as a soldier and writer. He has seen active military service on three continents and in four campaigns-on General Suarez Valdez's staff in Cuba in 1895, on the frontier of India, in the Soudan and in South Africa. He was a member of the Fourth Hussars and took part in the capture of the Khalifa. His first book was "The Story of Malakand Field Force." Among his other books is "Savarola," a Tale of the Revolution in Laucania. He was captured during the Boer war and made his escape. He expressed pleasure at the event as it made copy for his book the first chapters of which were written during the homeward voyage. While every one else was glad to rest from the thought or discussion of the war, young Churchill was untiring in his efforts to get from each individual all he knew of the war. He stood for Parliament but was defeated in spite of the campaigning work of his mother. He has seen enough of life in exciting history-making times to have something to say and those who do not flock to hear him from interest will do so from curiosity, so that a successful lecture tour is an Occasionally one of the romances in real life becomes known to the public and serves to strengthen the force of the old proverb that truth is stranger than fiction. By one of these strange turns of fortune's wheel the wife of one of the world's greatest artists, Bouguereau, is a quiet little New England woman. Madame Bouguereau might figure as the center of one of Miss Wilkins' vivid stories of New England rather than in the position that she holds in the inner circle of the art life of Paris. It was more than twenty years ago that the quiet little New England girl arrived in the great city. The famous artists had hardly opened their doors to women students, but the mild, persistent determination of Miss Gardiner won her a chance to study. She eventually became a pupil of Bouguereau and won first his admiration and then his love. He was then a widower but the French law makes the marriage contract incomplete without the signature of the parents. The mother of the great artist was selfish in her devotion to her talented son, and for twenty years refused to give her consent to his All in all the life of the one time New York belle second marriage. She had no personal dislike of any one, even of her son's children. During the long years of waiting Bouguereau saw his ambition for his American pupil realized. He hoped to see her become a great figure painter. He gave her constant criticism and suggestions until by many her work was thought to excel his own. Since her marriage Madame Bouguereau has painted but little. Her eyes have troubled her and her husband has insisted upon complete rest. She entertains delightfully in her studio and the privilege of being a guest there is highly prized. She is no longer young, she has never been beautiful, and all her years of Paris studio life have not eradicated a certain New England primness from her appearance and manner. But through her own talent and success she is recognized as one of the

The romance of the King and the Beggar Maid is repeated in semi-royal circles often enough_but it never ceases to provoke interest. It is not often that royalty itself can follow individual preference and permit that Cupid and Hymen shall reign jointly.

Servia is but a little kingdom but its young monarch Alexander has defied court, ministers and convention to wed the woman of his choice. The story reads like a page of some old romance, some remembrance of the time when the voice that breathed o'er Eden called to the first bridal. The King of Servia has married and married for love. Frau Draga Maschin comes of an honorable Servian family and is the widow of a military engineer. She is some years older than her husband. Queen Dragra is a stately, intellectual-looking woman and the romance of the wedding rather pleases the people of Servia who are willing to call one of their own race queen. The father of King Alexander is King Milan who abdicated in favor of his son. His wife, Queen Nathalie, has long been estranged from her husband and refused to be present at the marriage of her son and the widow of the military engineer. In spite of this fact there was a very splendid wedding in Belgrade and all the quaint ceremonies of Servia were used. The King has pleased himself and has evidently not displeased the mass of his subjects or the dominant power of Russia. In the glories of her Queenship and the love of her husband Queen Draga can forget the time when the hand of all in power seemed against her, and her royal lover had to station troops at her door to protect her from those who opposed the marriage.

Mrs. Cornwallis West, formerly Lady Randolph Churchill is one of the American women who have become distinct powers in the great life of London. It is nearly thirty years ago that Jennie Jerome made her debut at a Delmonico ball in New York. Here she met Lord Randolph Churchill and the mutual attraction was speedily followed by a brilliant wedding in Grace Church. International marriages were not as common then as now. Lady Churchill proved a most important factor in the political career that her husband began. She had beauty, tact, charm and ambition and these qualities made friends both for herself and her husband. The young man rapidly rose from one position of prominence to another and his wife became a leader in social and literary London. Her husband was made Secretary of State for India. Lady Churchill was as popular there as in London. Interested in all questions of public affairs, she accomplished so much through her position that the Queen bestowed upon her the Order of the Crown of India. This is a decoration much coveted and Lady Churchill is the only American woman to attain this rare distinction. Only about one hundred women wear the order and thirty of these wear it by right of royal birth. When the hospital ship Maine, fitted out by American money, sailed for South Africa, Lady Randolph Churchill, wearing the insignia of the Red Cross, was on board. She had two sons in active service and her interest as a mother was joined to her political devotion. Her first husband died in the midst of his sucessful career after a weary journey almost around the world in search of health. Her elder son had a dramatic escape from a Boer prison.

When the mail clerk has finished, the conductor walks up and down the platform ringing another large dinner bell, kept for the purpose in the station. When he has finished,

The officials of the railroads are all Cubans. They wear no special uniform except a cap, distinguished by having a celluloid visor which looks like tortoise shell—perhaps the real article; 1 am not sure about that.

There is little consolidation of railway lines in Cuba as yet. There are many very short lines, and as they are run independently of each other, a passenger is kept changing cars and buying new tickets at frequent intervals. The rate of fare seems high to one used to traveling in the United States. $18 was paid for a ticket for a distance of less than 300 miles, and there is an extra and heavy charge for baggage. This

BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

OCIETY has now turned its attention to the automobile. That the automobile for pleasure as well as business has come to stay cannot be denied. The automobile parade at Newport last summer was a success, while similar affairs the past season were numerous.

A motor wheel containing within itself all driving mechanism, and which is designed to be placed in the rear forks of any modern bicycle (after some necessary changes) has been patented by an Englishman. It is very aptly called the "Compact" motor wheel, and a recent trial of the device has demonstrated its entire practicability. The bicycle to which the motor wheel is attached differs but little in appearance from the ordinary safety machine. were numerous.

The motor is controlled by one lever, and so far as the control of the bicycle is concerned it is simplicity itself. On the right side of the handle bar is an ordinary brake lever for actuating a powerful front rim brake. On the other side is a similar lever by means of which the motor may be started or stopped.

In order to accommodate the motor wheel the back fork ends are spread considerably and

The inner ends of the trunnions are bracketed to the crank chamber of the engine, which keeps the motor fixed in a vertical position, while in the center of the trunnions the wheel sides revolve on ball bearings. It should be clearly understood that the engine never alters its position with regard to the frame.

The wheel sides are of aluminum and are each made in the form of dished flanges, the arms of which are sufficiently far apart to form a fan to cool the motor, and also to give easy access to it. The peripheries of the flanges meet and are grooved to suit the channel of the steel rim, into which the pneumatic tire fits, thrown into and out of engagement with the tire by a small lever clamped to the head of the bicycle. The extra weight of the motor, fuel tanks, supports, etc. is about 35 pounds and the attachment complete is furnished for $90. The tank will hold fuel sufficient for a 60-mile

The tank will hold fuel sufficient for a 60-mile run. In case of accident to the motor the friction wheel may be raised and the bicycle propelled by the rider.

Another application of the gasoline motor to the ordinary bicycle was shown in the same journal. This is a French device and in actual service it has given sustained speed of 25 miles an hour. The motor is hung and braced in the rear of the rear wheel in such a way as to bring the weight low and make balancing and turnthe weight low and make balancing and turning easy. The power is transmitted from the motor to the rear wheel by means of a 3-5-inchwide belt passing over a large aluminum pulley placed between the wheel and the rear fork. The weight of the bicycle and all attachments complete is but 70 pounds, and it is being worked to $105. complete is but marketed for $105.

MOTOR GOING TO HENLEY REGATTA.

The possibilities of automobilism are admir-The possibilities of automobilism are admirably shown by the accompanying illustration, reproduced from the Autocar. The two occupants of the "mobe", imbued possibly, with the desire to make their trip to the Henley Regatta (England) regardless of the tedium of railway and steamboat travel and of the tyrannous exactions of timetables—and at the same time to make sure of having a bout when they arrived at the scene of the famous aquatic contests—loaded their voiture (as shown in the meet and are grooved to suit the channel of the steel rim, into which the pneumatic tire fits, and grips the rim when bolted together. By undoing these bolts the wheel can at once be divided and the engine taken out.

The engine is of two horse-power and is fitted with rolled bearings at both ends. The pinions on the motor shaft meshes with an internal gear wheel, which fits into a recess in one of the wheel sides. The usual coaster brake feature is not omitted.

Half a gallon of gasoline is sufficient for a run of 50 miles, and the makers claim that a 200-pound rider can keep up a 20-mile-an-hour rate on level roads without difficulty, and that one-in-six grades may be negotiated without the rider's assistance in pedaling. The average fuel cost of operation is 20 cents for 100 miles.

Not only is the "Compact" wheel adapted for the bicycle, but fitted to a tricycle as a rear driver, with the two front wheels as steerers, it has given excellent results. It is also apparent that it has a wide field of usefulness in its application to tandem bicycles for pleasuring. The size of space available for the motor and accessories is so comparatively limited, however, as to preclude the possibility of its being used in track work, where motors of much higher power are demanded. It has not been introduced yet over here, and as I have repeatedly stated, it will be useless to write me for further information on this subject, or for the manufacturer's name or address.

The Cycle and Automobile Trade Journal recently showed a type of front-driving gasoline motor quite different from anything on the bicycle through the friction of an aluminum bronze wheel which is carried upon and slidably keyed to a light steel countershaft, running in bearings in links, which are free to revolve partially about the motor shaft, but concentric with it, thus raising the friction wheel from the tire or depressing it against the tire with any desired pressure. A one-eighth inch bicycle chain running over sprockets upon these shafts transmits the power to the countershaft.

The friction wheel is so mounted upon its shaft as to allow for any unevenness in the surface of the tire without binding. The wheel is rocking by means of side rails which act as guides. The system was tried experimentally at Brussels and gave satisfactory results, but things which can be done safely abroad are apparently impossible in England. As far as can be gathered from the arguments of counsel before the Committee, the scheme has been rejected on the double ground that it would be impossible to attain the speed promised by Mr. Behr, and that if such a speed were attained the new railway would draw away all the traffic from the old lines. These mutually destructive arguments strikingly recall the attitude of the wiseacres who, at the beginning of the century, did all they could to prevent the introduction arguments strikingly recall the attitude of the wiseacres who, at the beginning of the century, did all they could to prevent the introduction of the steam locomotive.

Much has been written and published pro and con about the effect to the bicycle on health, both in English and in other languages, but those who object to its use, as it seems to the writer, argue either from want of experience or from exceptional cases.

If, for example, the records of any large accident insurance company are examined at the present day a certain percentage of accidents is found to be charged to the bicycle. But this ratio should be considered in connection with the number of persons who ride and the number of miles ridden. Out-door air, when compared with indoor air, is more conducive to health, and the man whose occupation or recreation leads him to spend a part of his time in the open air is in general better fitted to resist the inroads of disease than one who leads an indoor, sedentary life.

It has been especially useful to women in leading them to open-air exercise and the abandonment of the worst foe of the female sex—the corset.

There are certain contra-indications to the use of the wheel which should be noted. Persons who suffer from serious organic heart disease ought not to ride except upon level ground and for short distances. The exertion of riding upon level ground is much less than that of walking. But that of hill-climbing is greater than that of walking up-hill, the difference depending upon the steepness of the hill.

Persons with advanced consumption of the lungs ought not to ride, but incipient consumptives or those who suffer from chronic bronchitis will undoubtedly be benefited by the use of the wheel, since it furnishes to them a mode of treatment which is specially useful, viz: open-air exercise, a matter of equal importance with good food and nursing. I am confident that the bicycle has proved to be one of the means by which the steady reduction in this disease in recent years has been promoted.

N. B. Please remember that I cannot give addresses or names of inventors or manufact-urers; nor can I answer private letters.

NE of our recent inventors claims to be able to construct a train that will run at a rate of one hundred miles or more an hour. This he proposes to accomplish not by building a more powerful locomotive, tructing one in such a way as to les-but by constructing one in such a way as to lessen the wind resistance. Our present locomotives are constructed with little regard to this point, and in attaining high rates of speed the resistance the air offers has been found to be an important factor. The idea is to construct the new locomotive with as little surface opposed to the air in front as possible, with sharp bows like a boat, so that the engine cuts its way through the air as a boat does through the water.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections; also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. To Cure Drunkards

MARY'S MIRACLE.

The day of working miracles,
I'm sure is far from past,
And to illustrate what I mean,
I'll tell you of the last Great one, that happened right to me,
For I was part of it, you see.

You know the life I used to lead— A kind of living death, A drunkard of the hopeless kind,— For, scarce a sober breath I ever drew, and hope and pride, Were lost to me and all beside.

MRS. MARY HARRY, 522 E. 4th St., Newport, K.

No, no not all—there was my wife, God bless her ev'ry hour! She saved me from a drunkard's grave And from Drink's fiendish power. Just how she saved me you shall see,— This is the way she told it me.

When hope was almost dead within Her faithful, constant breast. She read of Dr. Haines' Cure, Then without stay or rest, She sent for Trial Sample Free, And gave it, unbeknown to me!

I drank of it at ev'ry meal—
I ate it in my bread,
While Mary watched me anxiously,
But never word she said;
Until one day, I stopped to think,
That I had lost my love for drink!

When, quite unconscious, I was cured, Then Mary told me all; It seemed a kindness straight from God. A modern miracle: I call it this, because my wife And Haines' Cure had saved my life.

And now my little story's done,
And ev'ry word is true,
And what this Treatment did for me,
The same 'twill do for you:
And wives and mothers—one and all,
Take heart of Mary's Miracle.

A Trial Package Mailed Free to All.

This new discovery can be given in tea, coffee or food. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister or daughter looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed even against his will and without his knowledge or co-operation. Send your name and address to Dr. J. W. Haines, 2753 Glenn Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and he will mail enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee or food and that it will cure the dreaded habit quietly and permanently, also full dihabit quietly and permanently, also full directions how to use it, books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to aid you in saving those near and dear to you from a life of degradation and ultimate poverty and disgrace.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HERE are people in the world who consider a dressing-gown a luxury, but I cannot say that I agree with them. To my mind every woman must find a dressing-gown a necessity, and I am sure the possession and wearing of a warm one in the winter often guards against catching cold. I think that young people should be taught the need of a dressing-gown, and then when they are old they will naturally go on using it.

For a warm and useful dressing-gown flannel is, of course, the best material, and a pretty shade of terracotta or blue would please most girls. The gown I have in mind has a slight train. On either side of the front is a cascaded frill of silk, or lace might be used instead if preferred. The large, square collar is finished in the same way, and there is a deep frill at the wrists. The sleeves are comfortably large to admit of slipping on quickly. The back is finished in a watteau pleat, and the waist ribbons come from beneath it and are tied in two bows at the front. I always advise the lining of the bodice portion of a dressing-gown, for it makes it far warmer. A thin flannellette is useful for this purpose. Indeed, if you do not wish to go to the expense of having a flannel dressing-gown you might carry out this pattern in a pretty flannellete.

I much deplore the fondness of some mothers for dressing their girls up in all kinds of fussy and unsuitable frocks, and if they could only once understand how much better and more comfortable it is for the children to be simply clad I feel sure they would not continue their extravagant policy. The coat and skirt long ago invaded the realms of childhood. Of course, really tiny children cannot wear them, but for a girl of from ten to twelve, a suit of this kind is both becoming and useful, and the plainer it is the more useful it is. A rather bright blue cloth was chosen for a pretty suit. The skirt is quite plain save for a little kilting round the bottom of it. The coat is in sacque form and fastens with two large buttons. The most striking point it is form and fastens with two large buttons. most strik-most strik-ing point about it is the large col-lar of white cloth, finish-ed with a n a r r o w pleating; the turn back cuffs of the bishop sleev-es are of the same mate-rial and the combination of white with blue has a very pleasing effect. A cos-tume of this kind would kind would be more use-ful for school wear during the autumn and winter months, and, for home wear theskirt with a pretty blouse will answer every purpose.

As soon as the winter season com-mences just so as to in no way crush the dress beneath it. It is trimmed with a broad band of passementerie down the front, the same appearing on the outside of the sleeves. Round the neck is a soft, full ruching of velvet, out of which stands a high lace ruffle, the ends cascading down the front in a very pleasing way.

There are a variety of cheap silks to be had nowadays which would fashion this garment exceedingly well. It is wise to interline the yoke, while the whole garment will require either a thin woolen or silk lining. Frou-frou and frilliness characterize our evening gowns this winter. Many stitches, it is true, for in hemming these narrow frills there are yards and fards of hand work to be done, but the result is incomparable, and of this you may congratulate yourself, that if you are at the pains to spend the necessary number of hours in turning up and hemming hand-run frills,

A colored skirt may be covered with a diaphanous tissue of the same color in chiffon, mousseline de soie or crepe de chine; while a black satin skirt, which has become really quite shabby, may be covered with an almost transparent grenadine—which will restore it at once into an almost new gown. Your old skirt may be recut by the new skirt pattern, making some alterations if necessary, but the new overskirt can be shaped exactly on the fresh lines. On to the foundation the frills,

In these days, when shoes can be bought at such low prices, it is almost absurd to preach the necessity of keeping the feet well shod. Yet there are women who make the mistake of buying very cheap shoes. Cheap shoes are a mistake. The leather has in most cases been imperfectly tanned, and this causes the wearer's feet to swell uncomfortably and to become tender. Then these shoes never look well, even when they are new, and they become misshapen in a week's time. The consequence is that those who buy the cheap shoes buy them twice or three times as often as those who buy shoes at a moderate and fair price. It is economy to buy better shoes. omy to buy better shoes.

LAND AND OTHER CRABS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ERNEST JARROLD, AUTHOR OF "MICKY FINN IDYLLS."

MONG the most in-teresting of the natural phenomena seen by the American soldiers at Santiago, were the land crabs which swarm over that portion of Cuba.

soldiers at Santiago, were the land crabs which swarm over that portion of Cuba. From the yarns spun by the returning soldiers it may be safely inferred that those harmless creatures inspired more terror than the Spaniards. The hills surrounding Santiago were literally covered with crabs, varying from two to ten inches across the back. They are of almost every kind of vivid color and are extremely picturesque in appearance. The soldiers say that the land crabs infest swampy land, and are chiefly found in the vicinity of the cactus plant which grows extensively in Cuba. When disturbed in their hiding places they would hustle away, causing a peculiar rustling by contact with the cactus leaves which sounded to the alert ears of the soldiers like the sly approach of an enemy. So insidious and suggestive were these sounds that many of the soldiers, even when they were perfectly aware of the cause, could not overcome a feeling of alarm.

These land crabs differ from the marine crabs in two essential respects—in their locomotion and respiration. No more striking phenomena can be found in Nature than the adaptability of the crab to a life ashore. Naturalists generally unite in the belief that the crab was originally exclusively an inhabitant of the water, but through a mysterious decree of Nature the land crab forsook his native element and became a dweller on land, being frequently found as far as ten miles from the sea. That the land crab still preserves a love for his original element is proven by the fact that he makes a pilgrimage once a year to the sea for breeding purposes. Just as the crow through an infallible instinct flies to a mass meeting of crows once a year, so the crabs on a given day all move toward the ocean. Millions of these crustaceans moving through the grass at one time make a noise which can be heard for a long distance and which has a sibillant, nerve-torturing sound, that causes cold chills to run up the listener's back.

The first essential difference between the land and water crab can be se adaptations which has ever been known to man.

In Santiago the land crab is not regarded as fit to eat, although in the island of Jamaica the violet land crab, another species, is regarded as a great table delicacy. The violet crabs live in communities and form burrows in the ground often two or three miles from the sea. They are provided with powerful pincers, which they are not backward in using. When attacked they fall upon the enemy with one big claw which is then detached from the body. The creature then starts to make his escape while pain is being inflicted by the now independent claw. They remain in their burrows by day and come forth at night in search of food, running about with great speed and retiring to their holes in the presence of danger.

These violet crabs also deposit their spawn in tiring to their holes in the presence of danger. These violet crabs also deposit their spawn in the sea, traveling by night and surmounting whatever difficulties may be in their way. At this season they are taken in great numbers and their flesh is regarded as one of the chief delicacies of the island. Several years ago Robert Roosevelt wrote a learned treatise on "Why does a crab walk sidewise?" He answered his own question by stating that the crab could not possibly walk in any other way. The soldiers who saw the land crabs near Santiago, however, say the essayist is mistaken in his conclusion, for the land crab can dart along in any direction, straight ahead, sideways, or he can even run backward if danger comes from the front.

A little investigation shows the whole crab family to be a very interesting one. The rob-ber crab, an inhabitant of the Indian Ocean, ber crab, an inhabitant of the Indian Ocean, has a habit of passing a portion of its time on shore. It burrows under cocoanut trees and lives on the fruit which drops to the ground. Some authorities say that the robber climbs the cocoanut palms and plucks the fruit from the branches, as is the habit of the monkey; but this statement is contradicted by Darwin and other naturalists, although there is sufficient information to prove beyond a doubt that and other naturalists, although there is sufficient information to prove beyond a doubt that there is a species of crab which do climb trees to procure food. In order to get at the edible portion of the cocoanut, the robber crab strips off the outer bark of the shell so as to lay bare the eye spots. Into one of these the crab inserts the sharp edge of a claw, and by working this backward and forward the crab gradually scoops out the contents of the nut. The crab also secures the meat of the cocoanut by beating it against a stone until it is broken into pieces. The fibres of the nut they employ in lining their burrows. The robber attains a length of two feet. A lump of fat under its tail often yields a quart of limpid oil.

The crab has always been regarded as one of

The crab has always been regarded as one of the most toothsome of the family of crustaceans, It was a favorite delicacy on the table of the Romans, where it was known by the name of crabus. This variety is now recognized in Scotland by the name of parlan. This is one of the largest of the edible cras, and is everywhere esteemed in Europe for its delicacy of flavor. It is caught on the rocky portions of the coast of Europe, and it measures twelve inches across the back. The principal station for crabs is off the coast of Scotland and in the Firth of Forth. Large numbers are also imported from Norway. They are caught in crab-pots of wicker-work baited with dead fish, in much the same manner as lobsters are caught in Long Island Sound. In the sheltered bays they are caught in calm weather by poking from behind with a long pole. The crab seizes the pole, which is gently shaken. This makes the stubborn crab adhere all the more firmly, when it is lifted into the boat. It is very sby, eluding observation beneath stones and feigning death when unable to cope with danger. with danger.

is very sby, eluding observation beneath stones and feigning death when unable to cope with danger.

The largest of known crabs is called by the scientific name of inachus kempferi, or Japanese crab. This species measures ten feet long. The body is small and triangular in shape. It is said to be eaten by Japanese.

The calling crab of Ceylon has one claw exceedingly small, while its fellow is larger than all the rest of the crab's body. The big claw is carried aloft as if the crab were brandishing a weapon. The racer crab of Ceylon is busy most of the time digging deep burrows in the sandy soil of the island, making travel on horse back exceedingly dangerous. Large sums of money are expended every year keeping laborers at work filling up these holes. But of all the crabs, none is perhaps more interesting than the hermit crab. He is the smallest of his kind and is an arrant thief. This species is occasionally found in the bays and inlets of the Atlantic coast. The hermit kills a molusk of a particular kind suited to his uses, and gets into the shell. He fastens himself so firmly into his home that it is almost impossible to dislodge him. He guards the door of his house with a single claw, which is always thrust outside in a threatening manner. The mouth of the shell is usually draped by the beautiful sea anemone. To hold a hermit crab and his shell house up to the light, which is reflected in varied hues from the sea anemone, is one of the prettiest pictures which the sea affords. And when the hermit grows too large for his home and is found to hunt for another and larger habitation of the same kind, he always takes his anemone with him to decorate his new abiding place. The hermit is one of the most savage fighters of his family, and when seriously wounded and about to die he always leaves his shell.

Probably very few of the thousands who eat crabs every summer ever give a thought to the crabs every summer ever give a thought to the mysterious process the common crab (lupa dicantha) goes through before it matures into the ordinary "hard-shell" of gastatory reputation. During the first year of its existence the crab puts off its shell several times. When matured an annual suit only is required. When fully grown the crab's suit is permanent. When the female crab shows signs of shedding, the male crab comes along and gets on the female's back to protect her from enemies. She is now getting ready to shed and is called a "shedder."

When the back begins to burst near the tail

when the back begins to burst near the tail she is called a "buster." The male crab then digs a hole in the sand for her and finds a hiding place under a bunch of seaweed. She retires and comes out in a short time minus her shell, but perfect in every part. She floats away on the tide covered only with a fine thin skin. She is now called a "soft shell." The "firstide" crabs bring the high prices. At the second tide she is watery and transparent and is called a "buckler." By the time the third tide comes her shell has begun to harden, and she is known as a "hard shell."

AND INFLUENCE

and President of the American Institute of Science, has prepared whereby the ambitious can gain WEALTH, POWER, POSITION AND HEALTH. Through this course you develop a power that not only controls men and affairs, but through it you are taught that wonderful science which seems to come from the mysterious deep, now known throughout the civilized world as MAGNETIC HEALING. It has been proven that this power lies dormant in every human born into the world. Although this wonderful power has an origin which seems to come from the mysterious deep, it is easily mastered through the plainly written course by Prof. Murphy. You can LEARN AT HOME. The only education necessary, the knowledge to read. Through the knowledge you gain you are able, without the aid of drugs or the surgeon's knife, to barrassment of making their diseases and infirmities public, and on this account go through the world suffering tortures and pains, but through this method you are able to HEAL YOURSELF IN THE PRIVACY OF YOUR HOME, and in a few days you are in the sunshine of health to the surprise of your acquaintances. Many a modest woman suffering untold agonies from diseases peculiar to her sex has gone to a premature grave rather than subject herself to the embarrassment of an examination. The same can be said of men who suffered from indiscretions that they were ashamed to confess. This grand method permits sufferers of both sex to do away with this embarrassment, for by it they cure themselves without the assistance of anyone. The "BOOK OF HOPE" written by Prof. Murphy in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how you can gain this wonderful influence whereby you become proficient in curing disease and bad habits in yourself and in others, develop mental energy, gratify ambitions and gives you the key to personal and social successes, also teaches you the grandest and best paying profession of the day, as it is an acknowledged fact that there is no profession known today where independence can be so easily gained as through this grand profession. It reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of today.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address, and you will receive this grand book as well as the Magnetic Record, a 32-page illustrated magazine, without any cost whatever to you.

Thousands who have become successful through this course write similar letters to these:

Rev. S. P. Freyberger, Goshen, Ind., writes: Your course will enable the student to practice the Art of Healing as soon as the course is completed. Having practiced Magnetic Healing for a year past and having been very successful I thank you most heartily for the knowledge I received from a study of your mail course. H. A. Brooks, M. FAMOUS COMPOSITE BELLS.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

LL bells are com-posite in the sense that bell metal is a compound, but there bell imaking was carried to a high degree of excellence in Burmah, the magnitude and pleas in g tone of many of their belis being a source of pride to the Burmese. The largest specimen, as well as the one most highly regarded, is the composite bell in the vicinity of Amarapura, district of Rangoon. This is treasured in a magnificent pavilion, which in a series of stories of rich and curious architecture rises by the side of the "Golden Pagoda," the most celebrated edifice in Burmah. These pagodas are not temples, but rather memorials of the Buddhas, who, according to traditions, have watched over the progress of the people for untold ages. The bell pavilion is gorgeous in ornamentation and covered with gold of the exact weight of the king in whose reign the shrine was built. It is a conspicuous landmark, its dazzling cressing the first object seen from the ships making their way up the Irawaddy.

This mammoth bell weighs ninety tons, measures sixteen feet across the lip, with ample space inside for a dozentall men to stand with ease. From top to bottom upon the exterior an inscription runs in Burmese characters eulogizing the king who gave the sacred bell to the people. It is not rung in the ordinary manner, but a bronze mallet, suspended outside, falls with rhythmic precision on the heart of the bell, when the full, rich tones vibrate in the air for miles around.

Rare as is its melody it is as unique in its associations. Of its age the people say, "the holy bell was made thousands of years ago," and the tradition of its casting is as follows: For years the priests and the government had been making preparations for the event, and the day appointed for the rite was to be one of religious festival and prayer. At the summons the people gathered from all the country around, nobles and peasants, rich and poor of all ages. The presence of the children was particularly desired upon this important occasion, as to many of them the day might come when they could tell to their children's children the story of the ceremo

As the time drew near to open the pipe which would convey the molten mass to the clay mould, the master stirred the liquid fire and cast in a little zinc and other materials, the object of which is one of the secrets of the craft, but are popularly believed to give a more musical tone to a bell. More fuel was applied and as the fire roared still more furiously and the air was filled with the intense heat, a frenzy seized the spectators. A military officer, whose life had not been free from crime, dashed forward—

"And cast his sword in the molten flood Stained with the crimson of heroes' blood."

His example was contagious; nobles and merchants who were present in their most gorgeous attire yielded to the enthusiasm of the moment, hurling their precious jewels and wealth of gold into the seething mass; their wives and daughters joined in this act of grateful superstition, casting bracelets, gems and rings. Not one was too poor in this hour of fervid devotion to add his mite; so, paltry coins, cheap betrothal and marriage rings, with the cheap betrothal and marriage rings, with the tawdry ornaments of poverty poured into the bubbling metal. The little ones interested in the stir, though not understanding its meaning, imitated the action of their parents in tossing their trinkets and toys, metal dolls and idels a sid in forming "the boly bell of to aid in forming "the holy bell of Burmah.'

Burmah."

The circumstances attending its casting make it impossible to place any money value upon this offering of the people; but to the zealous followers of Buddha it has a peculiar sanctity, as they believe it to be under his especial care. The thousands of pilgrims who make an annual journey to the "Shoay Dagon," or Golden Pagoda, always prostrate themselves before it for a season of prayer and meditation before worthy to penetrate into the depths of the pagoda, which owes its especial meditation before worthy to penetrate into the depths of the pagoda, which owes its especial sacredness to the belief that it contains relices of the last four Buddhas, carefully concealed from human eye within the innermost shrine. It was the story of this bell and others of similar composition that proved the inspiration for the "Columbian Liberty Bell," which excited great interest at the time of its casting in 1893. It weighs 13,000 pounds, and in addition to the proportionate amount of the tin and copper there were one hundred pounds each of gold and silver, with an unknown weight of miscellaneous metals, all of which were priceless relics of American and foreign struggles for liberty.

These came from all parts of the world, rep-These came from all parts of the world, representing all periods, from a coin in circulation in the time of Christ, as it bore "the image and superscription of Cæsar", to the gift of our President's little daughter. Each state sent its contribution, usually of historic significance; gold, silver, copper, tin, lead and iron, came from the mines throughout the country, and the school children forwarded 250,000 pennies. It was in accord with the sentiment of the beautiful poem written by Mrs. Wagner of California, that more than twenty thousand gifts were received from battlefields, as in this legend of a far-off land:

"Knights came in armor and flung in the shields That had warded off blows on the Saracen's fields, Freemen brought chains from prisons afar— Bonds that had fettered the captives of war."

Fetters of the slave and prison locks mingled with the surveyor's chain of Washington, watch chain of Bolivar, the hinges of a door from Abraham Lincoln's house, the pen of Whittier, fruit knife of Lucretia Mott, relics of Kossuth, Kosciusko and hundreds of other noted dom. There were contributions of relics of all the Presidents, and hundreds of other noted coins of dear children, the wedding ring, the "widow's mite", and other precious pledges of affection. In the words of the poem:

"Pledges of love, a bracelet, a ring.

A gem that had fettered the captives of war."

The tale of their wrongs in the tones of the bell."

The casting was a grand success; upon its shining base one could read the motto of the "Old Liberty Bell":—"Proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all people," that prophetic message that came to our land twenty-three years before American independence was achieved. On the top are the Scriptural words from the "Centennial Bell,"—"Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will toward men." Upon its sounding heart appears,—"A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another."

From the overflow of this composite metal four small bells were exquisitely molded, and their disposition may be of interest. A delegate from the Humane Peace League carried them to Europe as symbols of Liberty and Peace. One was placed in the hands of Ambassador Bayard to deliver to the college nearest to Runnymede, where King John signed the Magna Charta. The second went to the Antwerp Peace Congress, then in session, where it was need instead of a gavel. The third become

The third became the property of the Lord Mayor of Dublin and the fourth was given to the Belgian Parliament to commemorate universal suffrage. The whole scheme was full of significance, while our own bell was only to be bell was only to be rung on memorable anniversaries, or to celebrate important events in our history.

It is a cause for deep regret that owing to monetary complications not fully explained, the patriotic composite bell has failed in its mission. Held in bondage for indebtedness, there seems little hope for its release unless Congress comes to its rescue or the people unite to free the bell whose components are so identified with our national progress, which can neither be duplicated nor restored. Only when free can it rightfully bear its name, and enable free can it rightfully bear its name, and enable is to say:

"I hear it, I hear it, that Liberty Bell
It comes to my ear like the resonant swell
Of the anthem of ocean and bears the refrain
Of the freedom the nations are striving to gain.
Bing on, then, ring on, O Liberty Bell.
The ages are waiting thy story to tell Along with the story of manger and plain,
Each waiting the other to join the refrain;
Then ring out the joy of the glory to be,
When broken each fetter, each captive set free."

MEMORIALS There is not a family which does not mourn the death of some loved one. In every case the desire exists to cherish their memory. For this purpose we have prepared a beautiful Memorial Picture, size 16x22. It is not gloomy, neither is it gaudy and in flaring colors, which would not be appropriate, but is printed in several quiet colors, and the effect is pleasing and beautiful. The words "In Loving Remembrance" are at the top. In the center is a figure clinging to the cross. "The Rock of Ages." There are spaces in which pictures can be placed if desired, also for age and date of death, besides several beautiful verses from Holy Scripture, etc. The words, "A Tribute to the Memory of," in beautiful and appropriate type, with lines for names, the whole making a most touching Memorial suitable alike for rich or poor. Price of this beautiful picture 12c., 9 for $1.00, 100 for $5.50, post-paid. J. Lee, Omaha Building, Chicago. post-paid. J. Lee, Omaha Building, Chicago.

The frost may be "on the pumpkin" but there is none in the toothsome pumpkin pie. The dainty must be eaten where it grows in the great pie belt, but no dainty cream, pastry or dessert can make a native New Englander forget "pumpkin pie."

Did it ever occur to you that you should be thankful not to be an Emperor or King or Prince? If what the gentlemen who work at that trade for a business say is true you should be very thankful you are not a ruling monarch. The Duchess of Argyle asked all the High Mightynesses what person they most envied. The substance of their replies was "Any one who isn't a king." Now will the plain American citizen be good?

The "voice of the people" as heard this November, will determine the immediate course and attitude of political affairs in Cuba, England and the United States. How far the Latin people of Cuba may be able to imitate the Constitutional Government of the Anglo Saxon nations remains to be seen. No Latin nation as yet has attained any lasting success through the ideals of government that have made England and America great and free.

The presidential campaign just closing has been a remarkable illustration of the change in political methods of the last quarter-century of presidential elections. Principles, not personalities have been the order of the day. It is not long ago that personal abuse and party mud-slinging was considered the proper means of winning votes. Our political affairs have certainly been handled in a more dignified manner than in any preceding campaign.

The West is responsible for two clubs which possess a common field of interest. There is the matrimonial club whose members pay dues and fines and garner the wealth of single members into a treasury. Then when a member really commits matrimony he gathers in the club surplus to pay for license, marriage fees and summer denies them. incidental expenses. A neighboring city has a divorce club, eligibility to which consists either in being divorced or "expecting to be." Its dues pay council fees and expenses incidental to slipping off the matrimonial nooses. The the towns and villages of New England foltwo clubs should consolidate and call them- lowed the lead of Governor Rollins of New elves the "In and Out Club" or the "Before and After Amalgamated Discontents."

It is not often that the English elections occur at the same time as the American. The English Parliament is elected for seven years. At any time during that period it may be dissolved if the House of Commons fails to pass any bill land names and show how far the pioneer spirit proposed by the party in power. The two leading English parties are the Conservatives, the is estimated that one fourth of the English party that has been in power, and the Liberals. The re-election of a Parliament favorable to the England descent. It would sound like the Conservative party will indicate that the nation supports Lord Salisbury in his foreign policy. tude to turn their faces homeward. From the The Boer war was a severe test of the party and during the dark days of English defeat it | England home holiday that brought her wanseemed many times that the government might not be sustained in the House. This has been called a Khaki campaign, as many of the oopular generals have been hurried home to electioneer for the Conservative party.

Now that it is cold enough to think coolly the good church-going people of our land may makes up a N 'v England Thanksgiving, these have an opportunity to decide as to the proper manner of conducting church services during any incident of the summer months. Summer the torrid season. The past summer outdid was the New England work time but Novem-

but impossible for humanity to enjoy anything -even religion. City churches as a rule are empty during the summer months, both pastor and congregation being absent. There is an occasional exception to this rule. Where there is such an exception the pastor and his elders tax their ingenuity to discover a method of keeping the flock within the sanctuary. One advanced minister solved the problem by chartering a steamboat and taking church congregation, choir and all for a Sunday on the water. Short services were held on board and a lunch was provided by the ladies of the congregation. Some of the strictly orthodox members were shocked at this nineteenth century method of meeting the difficulty of empty benches on hot Sundays. It was certainly a startling innovation but this is an age of change and progress. Many of the most earnest Christians believe that the future success and influence of the church rests in her acceptance and use of modern ideas and methods. To these people the Sunday church excursion is practical and praiseworthy.

The snail probably gave the first illustration of a portable house as he traveled slowly along, careless of wind and weather with his "portable house" on his back. The commander-inchief of the allied forces in China evidently does not expect to make his headquarters in the Imperial palace, for like the snail be carried his habitation with him. The modern portable house has a "for this week only" air that strongly suggests the rush and hurry of Yankee Land. It seems as if the word "patented" might be expected to stare from every partition. The idea has been utilized in cities where the school accommodations have not kept pace with the demand. St. Louis and some western cities have used the portable school house, and New York is to give it a trial. The old log schoolhouse and the "little red schoolhouse" do not seem such poor abodes for the goddess of wisdom when they are compared with those frail structures. If the "portable" building is used instead of a tent, its dwellers are probably the gainers in comfort, but to use it as a place where forty or fifty children spend a large part of their day seems a poor plan. No money is more freely furnished by our people than the sums necessary to educate children, and insufficient accommodations are the result of carelessness on the part of those who are at the head of affairs.

We are a flower loving people. Facts and figures prove this statement. When the out-ofdoor flowers have vanished before the breath of winter, the real floral reign begins in the cities. Florists' windows, street stands and street sellers make the city dweller forget the chill in the air and fancy that it is June. Flowers are a sign of luxury as well as an æsthetic necessity. In spite of the favor which the violet enjoys as a corsage bouquet it is only third in favor by the figures of expenditure. Last year the people of the United States spent $9,000,000 for roses, $4,000,000 for carnations, and $750,000 for violets. The violet, according to poetical ideas is a modest, country flower, but the violet of commerce and of cities speaks strongly of wealth, each tiny flower being worth four cents. November is the week of the fashionable horse show in New York and violets there are literally worth their weight in gold. The American Beauty rose so often used in house decorations, is worth a dollar a blossom. At such prices the total expenditure of millions does not seem strange. It is wise that Nature has planned her season when she lavishes her blooms by highway and hedge with never a demand for money, and wiser still that those whose highways are the hard stone pavements may buy the blossoms that Thanksgiving itself has almost been shaken from its place as a New England holiday by the great success of the Old Home week idea. Half Hampshire and welcomed home their children with bonfires blazing from the old mountains and speeches and rejoicings. The idea is poetical and people who had looked at western skies for years suddenly found that they were homesick for Yankee land. Salem and Portland in the far west repeat New Enghas carried the children of New England. It speaking people of the United States are of New tramping of a mighty army were this multiearliest days Thanksgiving has been the New dering children back. To many people an "Old Home" in November would revive more memories than one during the summer. The dull gray skies that hang low over the barren fields, the feel of the snow in the air or the exhilarating tingle of a clear bright day, the gathering at the "meeting house" and all that speak more forcibly of the "old home" than itself and all previous records and made it all ber was the season of rest. Then the toiling

MEDICINAL EFFECTS OF MUSIC.

Every one is aware of the influence that the mind has over all diseases and the soothing effect of music often has been of marked efficacy in mental diseases. Even so far back as the days of Galen, who was one of the fathers of medicine, the value of music for this purpose was quite well recognized and many of the earlier text books suggest its use.

One curious old book tells of the employment of music to cure sciatica, rheumatism and kindred ailments, which it explains as caused by vibrations of the nerves in unison with the notes of the music being played, and that these vibrations remove the obstructions that cause the disease.

Late in the eighteenth century a Dr. Mitchell wrote a very careful treatise on this subject and collected a vast fund of information of great value, both from a scientific and a historical view. The book contains many curious power satisfactory in more than the proven satisfactory in more than the proven satisfactory in the can there are not proven satisfactory in the can th samples of what music will do toward the cure of disease, and, indeed, gives a very full history of their connection in the medical books. But of their connection in the medical books. But that is very modern, for even the tablets and papyrus of Egypt show that in the ancient civilization even more attention was paid to music as a medicine than would be possible now. Even Æsculapius records that he cured a deaf servant by playing in his ear with a trumpet.

In the classics the same idea often appears and one scholar notes that in more than fifty places in the Iliad and Odyssey alone Homer has referred to music in this connection. In one place he has music employed to stay the raging plague. So on down to modern times case after case is noted both in fiction and science where music is used as medicine.

There can be no possible doubt that musical sounds produce a marked effect on the human system, as well as upon animals, as has been proven satisfactory in many experiments. Nor can there be any doubt that the sound of instruments contribute to the health of both body and mind. With more space at its disposal COMFORT will go further into this subject in a future time to the subject in a future time.

CONSIDER A MOMENT.

Did you ever go into a museum and see a spinet or harpsichord such as our grandmothers played upon and then considered a grand piano of modern manufacture? Did you realize that that poor insignificant harpsichord was more ter," writes Mrs. D. McPherson, Cobble Hill, B. C. "I was well pleased with the music and B. C. "I was well pleased with the music and could not have done nearly as well elsewhere," says Gladys Jones of Newtown, Mo., after receiving some. And so it is everywhere. Perfect satisfaction and great surprise. Try the offer once for yourself and friends and we guarantee you will be perfectly satisfied with the result that poor insignificant harpsichord was more valuable and a greater wonder in its day than the modern piano now? Did you think why? Just because modern methods and improved fast machinery entered into the construction of the larger work, and by it better and cheaper work was done in a fraction of the time consumed in building the first.

So, too, in the present time the best sheet music can be bought through COMFORT's music offer for just about the price of mailing. There is no doubt that it is the most wonderful offer for those wanting the best music at a bargain ever offered. We gladly repay you if it fails to satisfy you in any particular. THE PADRONE SYSTEM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

recent years much has been written in regard to the Padrone System of labor as car-System of labor as carried on in this country, and generally pictured as a colossal evil. There is no doubt but there are serious evils connected with this system but at the same time. but at the same time the matter is not usually quite as bad as cer-tain writers would have one believe, in no wise to be compared with to be compared with the frightful horrors connected with the so-called "sweating sys-tem." Be it not under-stood that the writer deems the Italian laborer sufficiently paid for his toil, his hours of work none too long, or his toil, his hours of work none too long, or his food and shelter all that is to be desired.

One can scarcely see them at their work, at their evening meal and asleep in their bunks at night, and hold such a view.

But with all his short-comings, the Italian laborer generally lives a happy-go-lucky sort of life, fairly healthy, and manages to lay by a snug sum each month that goes a long way in Sunny Italy toward the support of wife and children. It would seem that living as he does in frugal manner, he is financially as well off at the end of the month as many an American workman who receives twelve and fifteen dollars a week. No doubt there are instances where there are rank abuses of this system of labor, where the laborer is defrauded of that which is rightfully his, but this would seem to be the exception at the present day.

Not long since the writer spent a day among the Italians laboring upon a great undertaking, and during the hours thus passed learned not a little of life as it is among the Italians under the Padrone System.

Imagine, if you will, a horde of Italians, a a little of life as it is among the Italians under the Padrone System.

Imagine, if you will, a horde of Italians, a thousand of them, dark-skinned, sweaty and begrimed, shovel and pick in hand, struggling to lay hold of the "almighty dollar." Repul-sive to the idle and thoughtless, it may be, but full of interest and worthy of respect to the right-minded—for they are working men, toil-ing for the necessaries of life, and the main-tenance of a family at home.

Imagine, if you will, a horde of Italians, a thousand of them, dark-skinned, sweaty and begrimed, shovel and pick in hand, struggling to lay hold of the "almighty dollar." Repulsive to the idle and thoughtless, it may be, but full of interest and worthy of respect to the right-minded—for they are working men, toiling for the necessaries of life, and the maintenance of a family at home.

The one fact to be learned during their hours of toil was that they worked, for under the keen eyes of the bosses there is no opportunity to be idle. At night, however, when the men returned to their shanties, all was different; then it was that they were ready to talk.

A few moments after six the first of the Italians came trudging over the hills toward the encampment where I was awaiting their coming, some of them so weary with the day's toil that it seemed a great effort for them to drag one foot after the other. The store where the men bought their supplies stood at one end of the encampment and thither they at once repaired, purchasing a small quantity of macaroni, a loaf of bread and perhaps a bit of cheese, or it may be or it may be a few pota-toes and a small piece of bolognasausage.

Surrounding the store on all sides save one, stood scores of wooden shanties and snanties and sod houses, the latter built by the Italians and used for cooking; the former the property of the contractor and rented to the men.

Immed iately upon leaving the store were steps taken toward the preparing of the evening meal—the land.

"Mungel?" I said, having learned the Italian for food from one of the policemen employed to look after the men.

"Ye-ar," was the response, and half a dozen men showed their ivories.

"Man no good cook," explained one of the men, (and I noticed that his voice broke a trifle) "woman, she way off; Italy, so far, she good cook. I see her sometime."

The men were of all ages, young, middleaged and old men, all more or less stooped with toil, all moving ponderously about in their cowhide shoes. I had imagined that quarrels and murderous assaults were frequent, but found that the men were peculiarly at peace with one another; noisy at times but goodnatured. One of the policemen informed me that his beat while in the city was far more difficult and unpleasant.

The men are usually paid $1.35 per day, and of this very many of them manage to save the dollar intact, the American Express Company in an adjacent city forwarding to Italy during six months no less than seventy-five thousand six months no less than seventy-nve thousand dollars.

There is the dark side of the Padrone System, however, that must be considered before the matter is dismissed. There is a system of robbery going on constantly that tends to whittle down the Italian's savings and immensely increase the contractor's income. To three pullustrate, at the encampment which I visited, there was one sleeping cabin that sheltered eight ty men summer and winter. The building cost less than one hundred dollars, but the Italians are charged one dollar apiece each month for the privilege of sleeping therein. The contractor ought to furnish better shelter gratis. The profit to the contractor on this building alone is nearly one thousand a year, to say nothing of more than nine hundred other men who are similarly domiciled, and the sum total for the contractor is enormous—interest that would cause the eyes of the most greedy moneyshark to open with amazement.

Then, too, much that is purchased at the contractor's store above mentioned, is at an ad-vance over the city prices. Some of the Italians learn of this and attempt to buy their supplies elsewhere, but after several have been dis-charged they learn to their sorrow that they must pay the contractor's prices or work else-where.

must pay the contractor's prices or work elsewhere.

No doubt the time was when the Padrone System was far more abused than at present, when the Italian was literally robbed of ninetenths of his earnings, but recent legislation has done much to regulate this, and where such is the case, as said before, it is the exception, not the rule. There is much to be desired in the way of bettering the Italian laborer's condition, but be that as it may, it is an undisputed fact that he lives better and has much higher wages in America under the Padrone System than in his native land.

The moose, of which there are a good many, are expected to increase, the law against killing them having been made very severe. Of mountain sheep there are a few—mostly on Mt. Everts, near the post. Beaver, too, are plentiful. "The United States may well be proud to class Honolulu among her cities for it is one of the most beautiful places of its size in the world. Before reaching the island of Oahu on which the city is situated the steamer passes many others of the Sandwich group. The scenery is most picturesque and to the tired traveler who has been a whole week on the ocean it is a sight not soon to be forgotten.

week on the ocean it is a sight not soon to be forgotten.

"Honolulu is a very cosmopolitan city, having among its population of twenty-six thousand souls people from most of the countries of Europe and many Chinese and Japanese as well as the native Hawaiians. A ride about Honolulu is like going through one enormous green house. On either side of the broad roads are luxuriant palm-shaded gardens with hedges of brilliant scarlet hibiscus, delicate-colored oleanders and rare foliage plants.

"Almost the first place which the traveler wishes to visit after landing in Honolulu is the Royal Palace, where King Kalakua and afterward Queen 'Lil' lived. The American flag now floats over the building and it is used for government offices. One room however is left as in the days of royalty. This is the throne room. The furniture here is very rich, being overlaid with gold leaf and upholstered with heavy satin. Surrounding the Palace is a very large park filled with beautiful palms and rare tropical plants.

"Another place that the tourist must not fail to visit is the Bishop Museum, for here he will find a large collection of most interesting relics connected with the history of the islands. Among the precious treasures are the feather capes which were worn by the Hawaiian kings and their Court precious treasures are the feather capes which were worn by the Hawaiian kings and their Court on great occasions. These capes are about one and one-half yards in length and are made entirely of tiny yellow feathers. The Liwi bird from which these feathers were procured have only two of these under each wing, so some idea of the number required can be estimated. The life of the bird however was not sacrificed, for it was given its freedom after the feathers were obtained. Besides the capes there are numerous feather plumes. These resemble enormous dusters mounted upon very long poles. They were carried at public processions, coronations and funerals. There are many monstrous poi bowls and pestles to be seen in the Museum. The poi, as everybody knows, is the great national Hawaiian dish and is made from the taro plant. It is pounded until it is a stringy mass and when ready to serve is eaten with the fingers. People who have tried this food differ in their opinion as to its taste. Some pronounce it palatable, others say that it resembles sour paste. Patches of this taro plant grow about Honolulu. Itlooks somewhat like the calla lilly as to leaf and size. "One of the finest drives to be taken about Honolulu is that to Waikiki, a distance of about five miles. The road part of the way is on the shore of the ocean. The water here is as clear as a crystal and you can distinguish every pebble. Here the natives ride in their surf boats, which is a famous sport in Honolulu. All the way along are rows of very tall cocoanut palms bordering the road, or sometimes you see great groves of these trees. The trunks are as smooth as if they had been polished. At the very top they send out a branching tuft of leaves and clusters of fruit. Another tree frequently seen is the candle-nut tree. These trees bear a nut which the natives formerly used for lighting their homes. On this ride also one passes many sugar and banana plantations and coffee groves.

'They have a very pretty custom in Honolulu when visitors are leaving the city. On the streets everywhere on 'Steamer day' are seen for sale wreaths of different colored carnations, ginger and everlasting flowers. Your friends in the city buy these garlands, or lais, as they are called, for you and twine them about your neck. It makes the scene a most festive one, and you sail away carrying with you most happy memories of this 'Land to some of the Northern cousins and may amuse them as well.

The following description of a Southern celebration of Decoration Day will certainly be a surprise to some of the Northern cousins and may amuse

"Decoration Day, the great Eldorado around which seem centered the yearly anticipations of the colored folks of Beaufort, S. C., has once more passed away, leaving, doubtless, most pleasant remembrances for the participants in its celebration. It is strange indeed that on a day typical of sorrow and death there should be among the darkies down in Dixie so much genuine enjoyment and delight, and probably but few among them understand rightly the import of the yearly gathering.

"On the evening preceding the Memorial Anniversary of the Federal dead lying within the National Cemetery of Beaufort, crowds of negroes begin to gather and from their wondrously gay apparel, their merry jests and shouts, the noise, if not music of their attendant bands, one might imagine that some other victory than that of the grave was being celebrated. By midday of the thirtieth of May thousands have collected; Charleston, Savannah and the neighboring islands each furnishing its quota, and the succeeding hours belong exclusively to the colored residents and their visitors. Tables of refreshments are stationed here and there along the streets, and as the crowd surgest oand from the luckster must indeed be wary whose goods are not skillfully spirited away.

"About four in the afternoon, the dark throng and their visitors. Tables of refleshmens ale stationed here and there along the streets, and as the crowd surges to and fro the huckster must indeed be wary whose goods are not skillfully spirited away.

"About four in the afternoon, the dark throng being fully collected, with waving banners and music bearing no funeral sound, wends its way, in unalloyed enjoyment, toward the National Cemetery upon the outskirts of the town, and there, finally, a little solemnity is attempted by the colored orators of the day. Then follows the decoration of the graves, thousands in number, with flags and flowers, the work being chiefly performed by the colored veterans of the Federal army; and one can well imagine the consternation of the Northern warrior, could he suddenly arise from his quiet resting place beneath the sod, and behold the incongruous mass moving to and fro about his grave.

"But soon the evening shades are gathering; time and tide are waiting for no man, and the steamers' shrill whistles are screaming the warning that the excursionists should retrace their steps. This they speedily do; yet there are some who, having passed their day of decoration at the shrine of Bacchus, find it now impossible to preserve a proper equilibrium. For these suitable night accommodations are provided, with a morn of heavy reckoning ahead. Such instances, however, are happily the exceptions, and when we think of the vast concourse of truly irresponsible beings, thus curiously brought together we must accord them praise for their almost universally good behavior.

"It is a stated fact that many of the bones lying within this National Cemetery, and claiming the annual attention of the colored population, were never encased in human form, but are those of cows and other animals collected by swindlers in order to gain the reward offered for the remains of Northern patriots who had fallen on the battlefields near by. Shame on such duplicity! Yet the animal, like man, has fulfilled his destiny and a flag or flower may adorn the gave of of the cousins will be tempted by it to go to the Red river to hunt for the hidden treasure.

"Twenty-five miles from my home flows Red river, which separates my own state from the Indian Territory. Serpentlike, the stream winds between its quicksand bars and giant cottonwood trees, sullen, steathy, treacherous and blood-thirsty as the savages who used to roam along its banks. Countless numbers have found death in its murky water, and if a white garment be dipped into that water it comes out stained a dingy red, and nothing can ever restore its whiteness.

"On the river's southern bank are the remains of a rude fort, and a battleground where Spaniards and Indians met in deadly conflict a hundred years ago; and on the table before me lies a little heap of relics, bones, bullets, teeth, beads and arrowheads, gathered from that field.

"A hundred years ago the wide plains rolled from Red river to the Rio Grande, almost uninhabited except by the buffalo, the deer, the fierce grey prairie wolf, and the still more savage Red man. Then it was that a train of Spanish adventurers came up from Mexico and built the fort, from which they made journeys to the silver mines in what is now the Indian Territory. They were massacred by Indians. There is none who can tell aught of that fierce fray, but these grewsome mementoes speak eloquently. I fancy that this queer old builted burfed itself in a dusky bosom, and stilled a fearless heart, and this arrow let the life blood out of a Spanish breast. Perhaps this heap of blue and white beads ornamented a moccasin wrought to cover a fleet foot that turned to dust so long ago. Old legends tell that the Spaniards buried their treasure near the old fort, and parties from near and far have searched for it. Some say that the ore was found and carried away by Mexicans; others are of the opinion that it has never been unearthed. But as to which story is true, as our neighbors across the Rio Grande say, "Quien sabe?"

Our next letter takes again to the far Southern States and treats us to a "possum hunt."

"One of the many sports enjoyed by the farmer's oy is hunting the 'possum. In the fall of the year "One of the many sports enjoyed by the farmer's boy is hunting the 'possum. In the fall of the year when persimmons are ripe and the opossum is good and fat, the boys of the neighborhood congregate at the home of one of them, and after calling up the dogs and providing themselves with axes, for the purpose of cutting Br'er 'Possum out of a hollow log, or cutting down a tree in which he has taken refuge, they start on their journey around the swamps and through underbrush, with whoops and yells and barking dogs. Finally they hear the pack barking furiously away off in some dismal place, or perhaps in some old field, where the pale light of the moon diffuses itself among the foliage of the persimmon tree where the silvery gray varment can be seen grinning and heard growling at his pack of enemies below. Should the boys cut down the tree or induce the game to jump, the fun commences, for he is a bad customer when cornered and not infrequently the dogs feel his presence materially. When he is captured he immediately 'plays 'possum,' that is, pretends to be dead; although he may be kicked or beaten ever so hard, not the slightest signs of life will he give, and frequently those not acquainted with this 'possum ruse, have been fooled and have let the game escape. "Besides furnishing the best of sport in his cap-sum ruse, have been fooled and have let the game escape.

"Besides furnishing the best of sport in his capture, the flesh of the opossum is esteemed a delicacy. When the grey streaks of dawn begin to appear the boys may be seen wending their way homeward with the dogs, tired out from the night's hunt, following close at their heels, while in one hand a lightwood torch is held to light the way, and the other holds a large fat 'possum,' and while they are talking of the fun of the night they are thinking of the good things that they will buy when they have taken their 'possums to town and sold them." Charles C. Tindall, Jesup, Georgia.

Now I'm going to let you have a peep at a last year's Christmas tree, as perhaps some of you who have plenty of little ones but not an abundance of money may like to imitate it this year.

have plenty of little ones but not an abundance of money may like to imitate it this year.

"Times were rather hard with us last year and we feared Santa Claus would not visit us, but after much thought we decided we could have a very nice Christmas tree at a small cost and this is the tale of how we did it. Comfort had paid me a dollar for a letter and with it I bought three china dolls and a set of small garden tools, and with other dimes and nickles added to my purse I managed to get a little token for each member of our large family. I dressed the dolls in canary colored mull and baby ribbon, and having made little bags of crepe paper I filled them with nuts and delicious home made candies. Boxes of all shapes, hats, hearts, and horse shoes, were made of pasteboard and covered with dainty colored crepe paper, and filled with candies fit for kings to eat and the equal of Lowney's make. Many other gifts were provided, all fashioned by my own fingers or those of other members of the family, with small or no expense for materials, such as aprons, neckties, handkerchiefs, pen wipers, needle cases, etc.

"The tree was a pine sapling planted in a large stone jar filled with earth, with cotton on top of the dirt to resemble snow. We placed it in front of the parlor fireplace and through the branches was fastened a chain of gilt tinsel, while gaily colored angels and a Santa Claus, peeped out here and there. The gifts were so hung on the tree as to show to the best advantage and the large boxes and parcels were placed on the rug beneath.

"One of the boys was Santa Claus, he wore a coneshaped cap covered with cotton-fiannel to look like fur, and the waterproof coat he wore was trimmed with the same kind of goods; with his long white hair and beard of cotton wool he made a very good St. Nicholas, and when he came out of the fireplace it seemed as if he had really come down the chimney. He made a little speech to the children and then distributed the gifts from the tree.

LOUELLA SPENCE, Pass Christian, Miss. Now let us sail straight (?) up the Mississippi river and visit the scene of the famous Battle of Lake Erie.

"In the southeastern part of beautiful Lake Erie lies a group of about fifteen islands, large and small; some cultivated and improved to the water's edge, others still wild and rocky as nature left them. This portion of the lake is a land-locked harbor, so shut in that gales cannot penetrate; hence its waters are at all times quiet and serene, furnishing great facilities for boating and fishing. Some of the islands are literally covered with grape vines, the famous Catawba grape being produced herein great abundance and furnishing a large amount of the wine that is yearly consumed. "These islands are famous in American history, "In the southeastern part of beautiful Lake Erie the noted Captain Oliver H. Perry having won his anaval victory over the British in this harbor on September 10, 1813. In his now famous official dispatch announcing his victory Perry said:

"We have met the enemy and they are ours; two ships, two brigs, one schooner and one sloop. Many of the islands still bear the names given them by Perry. Pebble Island he so named on account of the many pebbles on its shores. Gibraltar received its name because of its steep and rugged cliffs and was much used by Perry as a lookout station. Wonderful, indeed, is its scenery. On one of its headlands, facing the harbor, now stands a large stone, surmounted by a beautiful bronze vase, the whole dedicated to the memory of the heroic Perry.

"Put-in-Bay is a lovely sheet of water with little Gibraltar islet nestled in its crescent. After leaving Presque Isle, where he had built his war vessels from the growing forest, Captain Perry made sail for the head of the lake and anchored in this bay, opposite the British fleet.

"Taken as a whole the islands of Lake Erie, in their beauty of scenery, grace of outline and shady groves and vineyards, form a most beautiful spot. It is difficult to imagine, as we look upon the peaceful harbor with its deep blue waves calmly lapping the shore that those waters were once stained crimson with the blood of dying soldiers. A feeling of sadness steals over us as we think of the brave boys who so courageously faced death on that glorious autumn day for the sake of that same flag for which our soldier boys of to-day are giving up their lives."

Our old friend, George Johnson, of Burlington, Kansas, has sent me several letters of late, and are also interesting, but I have recently published letters on both these subjects.

"It has been a matter of much speculation whether Kansas would be Kansas—whether the people of Kansas could prosper without its winds. Many regard them as a great drawback to the country, while others look upon them as its very life. It is true Kansas is the cradle of the cyclone and of the blizzard. The wind blows eleven months in the year and the twelfth month it blows extraordinarily. One cannot step out of doors but his hat is askew, his hair disheveled and his face looks as though it had been washed in a mud puddle and dried up the chimney. This is all very disagreeable to one who is not acclimated, but the people of Kansas could no more live without its winds than a fish can live out of water. Should it stop blowing for a single day in the summer, they would long for it with a most intense longing, for without it the air under the blazing sun becomes suffocating. "The wind is in other ways an advantage to Kansas, a three days' incessant blow generally bringing rain on the evening of the third. The trouble-some grasshopper and chinch bug are also blown away by the wind, and the gigantic mills for pumping water or grinding corn, or for other purposes, all depend for the power for their immense sails upon these same ever prevalent winds."

Now that everyone is looking for "the antique" to ornament the house, things almost Now that everyone is looking for "the antique" to ornament the house, things almost valueless in themselves are bringing sometimes absurd prices simply because they are old. An easy and inexpensive way for anyone who can handle a few tools to make Christmas presents, was conceived by an ingenious boy a short time ago, who made cedar chests and clock frames in miniature, and a number of other little ornaments, out of the sides of a few old cigar boxes. The miniature hall clock is made of thirteen separate pieces and whittled out with a common jack-knife, being held in place with small tacks and glue. When it is all together, a cheap watch can be obtained for a dollar and hung in the opening left for the dial to show, and with the total expenditure of what such a watch costs a very unique and valuable little gift may be made. The clock here described was twelve inches high, the base being two and one-half inches high by two inches wide at top, and three and one-half at bottom. The top is in same proportion. Dial opening two inches across.

A delicate odor of violet or some equally

A delicate odor of violet or some equally sweet flower or perfume is very desirable, though care should always be used that it is not too pronounced. Just a suggestion shows the best taste. To accomplish this, the sachet powder between layers of cotton batting should be plentifully strewn through one's bureau drawers where the veils, neckwear and lingerie are kept. For the bodice, however, the very latest way is to cover the ends of an ordinary wire hanger, and then the inside of the bodice are kept. For the bodice, however, the very latest way is to cover the ends of an ordinary wire hanger, and then the inside of the bodice is always sweet and fresh. This may be accomplished by making bags for the ends of the hanger, of ribbon five inches wide. Lay a thick strip of batting onto the ribbon and then lay the ends of the ribbon together, (the batting on the inside, of course) and featherstitch the selvedges of the ribbon together. Draw on over end of hanger and gather and fasten near the center. Tie with ribbon if desired.

A broom cover is a very convenient thing to have in the house, for dusting the tops of doors and windows and the walls. Our illustration shows clearly how they are made. Lay the broom to be used onto a piece of cretonne or cambric and cut a double piece an inch larger all around. Seam up one side and the bottom, leaving top and one side open, to be fastened with buttons or ribbon bows, after inserting the broom. If desired a ruffle could be put across the bottom and then left open at bottom and top, both sides being seamed up. Then the broom could be pushed in, handle first.

Her Home—Her Advice to Others.
They are worked by hand upon linen, stiffened at the back and then cut out close to the embroidery. They are then ready to be applied to any piece of work by simply buttonholing all around the edge with a fine silk of the same shade. The only flowers yet shown are roses in pink, yellow and red. The shading and stitches upon these seem perfect, and certainly few workers could equal them; of course the difference would be apparent upon examining the under side of the fabric, but the effect is the same as though done upon the goods itself. In combining Battenburg and embroidery the floral design often overlap, the lace and all the difficulties of the work as ordinarily done are simplified by applying the ready embroidered spray.

Some of the new centerpieces have a conventional border of openwork design, all the spaces of which are underlaid with net. The design itself is done in long and short stitch in two delicate shades of green. The method of decorating is simple, as only the one stitch is employed, and the finished piece is especially dainty.

The newest handkerchief, glove and necktie cases are of embroidered linen, the edge

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

O much has already been written and said on the subject of the on the subject of the eclipse of last May that I fear that Comfort's many readers will dub me a "back number" if I so much as allude to it at this time; and yet as no one has so yet, as no one has, so far as I am aware, written of it in these pages, I venture to mention it in connec-tion with other events of the trip which I am about to describe. It was the occasion of the annual excursion of the National Geo-graphical Society, of Washington, D. C., and had been planned with especial reference to the eclipse. One of the steamers of the Wash-ington and Norfolk

ington and Norfolk line, with a carrying capacity of two hundred and fifty persons, had been chartered for the trip, and it was supposed the accommodations provided were ample for all who would desire to go; but for once the committee of arrangements made a mistake, for the number of disappointed would-be-excursionists fully equalled the fortunate holders of tickets and loud were the lamentations of cursionists fully equalled the fortunate holders of tickets, and loud were the lamentations of those left behind.

As the eclipse was to take place early on the morning of Monday, the twenty-eighth of May, Sunday evening at seven saw us steaming down the Potomac river. Past the Arsenal and Saint Elizabeth's Insane Asylum, Alexandria, and the many river resorts, we sailed in the beautiful evening light; past Fort Foote and old Fort Washington, and, just as the shades of night were gathering around us, the bell of the steamer tolled at Mount Vernon.

Perhaps I should explain here that it is the custom of all steamers, which ply up and down the Potomac always to show this mark of respect as they pass the place where rest the remains of him who was—and is—"First in the hearts of his countrymen," while the steamer's band at the same time plays softly the strains band at the same time plays softly the strains of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," or "Mount Vernon Bells."

As darkness increased the excursionists left As darkness increased the excursionists left the decks for the forward saloon, where they were called to order by the President of the society, Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, whom all the world knows as the inventor of the "Bell" telephone. Following him came the venerable Professor Simon Newcomb, late astronomer in the Naval Observatory and the Nautical Almanac Bureau. Professor Newcomb lectured for a short time upon sellings, in general and Almanac Bureau. Professor Newcomb lectured for a short time upon eclipses in general, and gave us much good and practical advice as to the best way to view the coming one.

Professor Willis L. Moore, Chief of the Weather Bureau, talked for a short time upon the rapid development of that Bureau, and its usefulness to mankind, stating that it has been in existence only thirty years; and won for himself unbounded applause from his audience when he remarked, in closing, that he could promise us perfect weather for the morrow; which promise, by the way, was fulfilled to the letter.

row; which promise, by the way, was fulfilled to the letter.

The Rev. Edward Everett Hale, who had come from Boston to Washington for the sole purpose of joining the Geographical Society in their excursion to Hampton Roads, was called upon for a speech. His huge frame, his large head covered with long, shaggy, fron-gray hair, his dark, piercing eyes, his wide-brimmed, soft felt hat, and his long cape coat made a striking figure as he stepped forward in response to tell us a story which, he assured us, "is strictly true."

At the time of the eclipse of 1806, he told us, his father was a professor in Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, and as the belt of totality was New Hampshire, and as the belt of totality was to cover that vicinity great were the preparations for viewing it. Near to Exeter is a small town called Hampton, and when the eventful morning arrived the people of Exeter were astonished to see the streets filled with the inhabitants of Hampton, in all their best array, coming in carts, wagons, stages, and even on foot. When asked why they had come they replied "To see the eclipse, to be sure. Hampton is so small a place that the eclipse would not dream of coming there."

"Now," said Mr. Hale, "One hundred years later I have come to Hampton to see the eclipse because Boston is so small a place that the eclipse is not coming there," and he sat down amid roars of laughter from those who know Boston and her pride.

Monday informing early saw us sceaming into Portsmouth harbor, having passed at Hampton Roads the steam yacht Dolphin, upon which were President McKinley and his party, who had come from Washington upon the same had come from Washington upon the same errand as ourselves; and at seven o'clock we were safely tied up to the pier at Portsmouth Navy yard, our cameras in position, our sheets spread to catch the shadow-bands, our glasses smoked, and everything in readiness for the great event. We watched the varying phases of the "glorious orb of day" as the little moon impertinently pushed herself before him. We felt the strange chill in the air as the light gradually disappeared. We watched for shadow bands, and saw them not; but we did see the magnificent corona at totality, the bands of light beyond, the stars—Mercury, Aldebaran and Venus, the wonderful tints of dawn in the horizon, and the curious crescent shadows as horizon, and the curious crescent shadows as totality neared and passed off. It was a con-derful, a thrilling experience, and all hearts were touched and all voices awed into silence as we gazed upon the weird but magnificent

After the eclipse had lost its interest we passed an hour in roaming about the navy yard, inspecting its relics of war in the way of guns and cannonballs. We wandered over the Terror and the San Francisco, both of which were then laid up here for repairs, and studied, with the aid of our fieldglasses the unwere then laid up here for repairs, and studied, with the aid of our fieldglasses, the unfortunate Reina Mercedes which was anchored in mid-stream, with all her shattered machinery and guns, yellow with rust, in full view through the terrible holes made in her by our missiles of war.

At ten o'clock we started for Newport News, which we reached just before noon. While there we visited the new dry-dock, just build-war vessel, which also was only partly finished, and which is intended as a companion to the Kentucky. We inspected the Kentucky from stem to stern and from hold to the turrets and the fighting tops, under the guidance of a bright-eyed sailor boy in immaculate white duck. While standing in one of the turrets the noon whistle blew, and we watched, amazed, the army of workmen of all degrees and nationalities stream off from their work on ships or in machine shops to their noon meal, and we steamed away from Newport News more than ever convinced of its size and its value as a shipbuilding plant.

Our next stop was to be at Yorktown, the little town on the York river, which holds so important a place in the memory of every citizen of these United States. We were somewhat disappointed in our visit, however, for we were so long on the way that our stay there was necessarily very short. Every one rushed for the old battlefield as soon as the steamer touched the shore, where, upon its highest point, upon the spot where Cornwallis surrendered his sword to Washington on that memorable nineteenth of October, stands a magnificent shaft of gray granite, surmounted by the Angel of Peace with wings half folded and arms outstretched in blessing. This is said to be the finest monument in the United States. Around the shaft just above the base are thirteen female figures carved in bas-relief, representing the thirteen original states. Below, on the four faces of the base, are inscriptions commemorative—one of the surrender of Cornwallis, a second of the admission to the Union of the thirteen original states, and the other two I do not know, as I had not time to read them. This monument is shown in our initial.

Half way up the village street between the wharf and the monument still stands the "old Nelson House" where the articles of capitulation between Cornwallis and Washington's headquarters at that time. It is still used as a dwelling house, and is in a good state of preservation. The family in pos easion kindly allowed our w stand-still to the last degree. Down near the wharf are buildings which must have been in existence in Washington's time, which are litterally dropping to pieces from age and decrepitude, with no attempt made to preserve them. The church, of brick, covered with stucco, stands in the midst of the graveyard, and is as venerable and aged in appearance as the Nelson House. We longed to linger in this historic spot, but the inexorable whistle sounded, and we hurried on board our steamer, casting regretful looks behind as we sailed down the river and away. river and away

Our next and last stopping place on this trip was Fort Monroe, where we arrived in time for evening drill. We admired the Kearsarge as she lay at anchor near the Fort, spic and span in her white and yellow paint and gleaming brasswork. The fort, or fortress, as it should rightfully be called, is surrounded by a most or tide-water ditch eight feet deep, and measuring in circumference about experts of the state uring in circumference about one and one-half s, within which enormously thick walls of gray granite enclose a space of eighty acres upon which are the barracks, the officers' quarters, the store houses, workshops, parade grounds, and all the necessary equipments of such a place.

We marched in over the bridge, bearing with us our cameras loaded with plates or films ready us our cameras loaded with plates or films ready for "snap shots;" but imagine our chagrin when we were politely but firmly stopped by the guard with the remark that "cameras are not allowed inside," and one by one we relinquished them and saw them stacked (no other word will express it) in the embrasure behind the guard. However, we made the best of our disappointment and laughed at the blank faces of our friends as they gave up their cameras.

The up-to-date housewife includes a knowledge of carving among her accomplishments, and in the majority of instances it is carving that justifies the name. One of the first things that is taught with regard to carving is sharpening the knives. Use a good steel and bring the knife down first one side and then the other with an easy, sliding stroke, at an angle of 20 to 25 degrees.

A knife of moderate size is required for good results, and the platter should be placed near enough to the carver to give her control of it. It should likewise be large enough to allow room at the side to place the portions of meat as they are carved. In carving beef, mutton, lamb and veal, thin, smooth slices are desirable, and they should be cut across the grain, taking care to pass the knife through to the bone of the meat. In carving a leg of mutton the best slices are obtained from the center, and next choice from the broad end. The pieces from the part next the knuckle are apt to be dry. A sirloin of beef yields its best slices from the end near the tenderloin. If it is cut through in this part the pieces must be fairly thick; if long, thin slices are desired it should be cut across.

In carving chicken or turkey, place the head to the right, cut off the wing nearest, then the leg, and then the second joint; then slice the breast until a rounded piece appears. Slip the knife between that and the bone, and separate knife between that and the bone, and separate them; that is considered the best part of the bird. Next comes the "wish bone." After this turn the bird over a little, and just below the breast will be found the "oyster," which can be separated like the inner breast. The side bone lies beside the rump, and the morsel can be taken out without separating the whole bone. Follow the same method with the other side.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to Comfort Palmistry Club. Augusta, Maine.

To notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke stide uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, paims downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixally, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomiter. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, we il-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender vertiren on it. Putly is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixalif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several

HERE are so many hands waiting this month that I will proceed at once to the readings.

"November" has the hand of a very refined gentlewoman, one who is faithful, fond and true. She is delicate in her tastes and has a talent for art and for music if she chooses to develop it. Her health will be a trifle delicate from twenty to thirty, but she will take care of herself and will live to a ripe old age. She will have considerable opposition from friends and relatives during the period between twenty years and thirty, but will finally triumph and the latter part of her life will be uncommonly smooth and easy. There will be a decided change in the manner and place of her career about the age tions; she ought never to be obliged to "NOVEMBER." living or to be burdened with much care. On the whole, however, hers is a good hand and a lucky one.

"E. L." has hands of a very different type, his being masculine where the last were feminine in characteristics. The lines in these are very heavily marked and I should say that this man is very emphatic in his nature, plain and straightforward, almost to bluntness, and lacking in the finer arts: at the same time be will straightforward, almost to bluntness, and lacking in the finer arts; at the same time he will be honest and true, reliable and trustworthy: a solid business man. Some of his markings are very peculiar, more so in his left than his right hand; so that unless he is left-handed he has overcome his most peculiar tendencies. He will not live much beyond three score years and will die suddenly when he goes. He will have many obstacles to contend against in early life and has been much hampered in youth have many obstacles to contend against in ear-ly life and has been much hampered in youth by adverse conditions. These he will overcome and after thirty will achieve some degree of success. He is a nervous man and has a temper of his own, not a bad thing if he knows how to handle it. I cannot find any sign denoting marriage, but the lines may have been obliterated by some accident, for there seems to have been something of that kind during the past few years. His is a peculiar hand in many respects and one that is not easy to read from paper. I would advise him, the first time he is near a good palmist, to have a reading. The quality, condition, temperament and so many attributes of the living hand are so apt to affect the reading, that I would much would prefer to have seen and han-dled this one personally.

"H. S." may look in the next "E. L." number of COMFORT for his readings.
"Viclet" has sent a photograph of both hands which is quite clear and good, though as I have often said, no photograph is as good as a smoked paper impression. I wish every one who desires to communicate with this colas a smoked paper impression. I wish every one who desires to communicate with this column would consult the conditions. Violet's hands are well defined, showing a neat and orderly person, with plenty of courage and self-reliance. She will always be well fitted for going ahead and working her own way in the world and will be successful in the main. Early in life, perhaps from twenty to twenty-five, she will meet with some great obstacles that will cause her a great deal of trouble and will seem to be a genuine set-back, in her career; but she will have good courage and will persevere, overcoming in the end. On the whole hers is a lucky hand and she will accomplish something worth while in life. She will marry once and happily, although against the wishes or judgment of her friends. She will be a good wife and kind mother. Her health will be good in the main and will improve the older she grows and she will live to the age of seventy or over. She will have many friends as she is trustworthy and true. The man who gets her for a wife is to be congratulated.

I have a good many calls from readers of Comfort for private delineations of character.

As I have repeated

As I have re-peated here word the reading belongs.

I may add, though, that those who do not wish to bother to get the necessary subscribers to Comfort, can send the $2.00 with or without names of subscribers, and their readings will appear as early as I can possibly get to them.

"March Hare" asks for further explanations of the phrase "she does not dare live up to what she knows would be good for her!" This I get from the twisting of the beginning of the life line with that of the head. They are not separated until she is grown up and when such lines appear, we know that the subject lacks the stick-to-a-tiveness necessary to actual accomplishment of her ambitions. She has high ambitions and aspirations and often knows in a flash what she ought to do; but on second thought she decides to postpone action. She should carry out her first impulses and promptly, and so cultivate the perseverance she needs.

She will rom friends and between twenty lly triumph and be uncommonly ll be a decided ce of her career about the age of thirty and it will be for the better. She will make two marriages, both advantageous on es. She will see some trouble, however, for her hand is hollow and the inside of the palm is crossed by many lines. The line crossing is the life line; where it crosses in that line.

"Millie" says, and I feel that a great many readers agree with her statement:

"The answering of questions is a great help to me. I wish to ask about a crossing of life and fate lines in the right hand, being in the left a quarter of an inch apart. The life line comes to about half way from the wrist. There it disappears and another line begins half an inch above the ending of that line and continue, very deep and clear, to an inch from the wrist, where it crosses another very deep line, which goes up, gradually less distinct upon the Mount of Mercury. "What does it denote when a man's hand contains no lines whatever but the life, head, heart and fate lines, these being deeply cut?" Nothing, except a moderately successful and uneventful life. The fine lines are unnecessary.

"When there is a gathering together of many fine lines on the mount of Apollo, is it a sign of anything?" Two only, cross. Probably a scattering of the good qualities of this Mount. If they form a star or a square, good; a cross, bad. Many fine lines, ill-luck.

CHINESE SECRET SOCIETIES.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE prominence of China at the present time caused by the recent riots of a secret society there known familiarly as the "Boxers" makes the subject of Chinese Secret Societies on e of general interest. The Chinese Empire is filled with secret societies, aggregating millions of members, all more or less power-ful, and nearly all or-ganized to oppose the system of govern-ment.

First in importance comes the society known as the T'ien-Ti-Hwey, the associa-tion of Heaven and Earth, with its symbol of a triangle. Its foundation is known foundation is known to date back as far as 1664. It was first described in 1825 by Gustav Schleged. A Chinaman had been arrested for theft and his house was searched, and books and papers of the society were discovered, showing the existence of a lodge in the city of Padang with over 200 members. This society claims an antiquity dating back to time immemorial. Its ostensible motto, "Obey Heaven and do Righteousness" is said to be understood by its members to mean, "Drive out the Tartars, overthrow the government."

derstood by its members to mean, "Drive out the Tartars, overthrow the government."

Tradition says that years ago that the Tartars revolted and caused the emperor a great deal of trouble. He was helped to victory over his enemies by a Buddhist Abbot, who led his monks against the enemy. For this action he was richly rewarded by the emperor, but the emperor's favorite, becoming jealous, obtained a false order against the bishop, and had his monastery burned. Only five of the monks escaped, who were the founders of the present order and are reverenced by its members as "The Five Ancestors." They raised an army and succeeded in defeating the emperor, after which the army was disbanded and each man instructed to go home and raise recruits for the instructed to go home and raise recruits for the new order.

The society claims the allegiance of all of Chinese blood, and goes to any length to secure members, initiating many by force. Each branch of the order has several members known branch of the order has several members known as Tai-ma, whose business it is to hunt up recruits. When a man has been selected whom it is thought would be a good addition to the society, he is notified to be present at some secluded part of the city at a certain hour. This notification is sometimes made in writing, sometimes the candidate is stopped in some public place and bidden to follow to the place of meeting. However the notification comes, the candidate rarely dares to disobey. The society has various ways of punishing one who refuses. Either he is enticed away and given a severe beating, or he finds himself accused of some crime, with witnesses enough in the employ of the society to render his conviction almost certain. Sometimes the candidate is abducted and carried to the place of meeting where the wishes of the society are imparted to him.

The meeting-places of the society outside the city walls are guarded with pitfalls, armed men, and massive gates. Instances have been known where strangers have been killed by the guards for trespassing while the society was in session. The candidate for admission to the society, dressed in the prescribed fashion, in new white garments, pig-tail loosened as a token that he renounces the government, with his right shoulder and knees bare and his pockets empty, is met outside the executioner's gate by the Registrar, and is escorted with numerous formalities and great ceremony through the various gates until he stands before the Master of the lodge. Here he prostrates himself before the throne, while eight councillors rest their sharp swords on his shoulder until he is accepted. After this he is given a cup of arrack, and scratching his body he lets a few drops of blood fall into the cup. He then drinks and is escorted outside the walls again. The next day he is met by the secretary, who gives him the necessary passwords and a manual of instructions.

It cannot be discovered that this lodge has structions.

It cannot be discovered that this lodge has any one head, but the masters of the five grand lodges in China meet and direct the society in all parts of the world. It is not known how intimately Chinamen away from home are connected with their native lodges, but they probably send money to China for their support.

The Tien-Ti-Hwey alone has millions of members, and its influence, at least in the past, has been tremendous. Members pledge themselves to support one another and oppose their home government on all occasions. There have been frequent dangerous and serious outbreaks been frequent dangerous and serious outbreaks in the history of the society, and it is regarded as a very dangerous element in the manage-ment of the country. On some occasions mem-bers of the society have defied the native offi-cials to do their worst—with the result that cials to do their worst—with the result that they have escaped punishment for crimes they undoubtedly committed.

Next in importance to the Tien-Ti-Hwang is the Wei Keaow, or the order of the White Lotus. They are also called the "Do Nothings." The first mention of this society is in 1724. Members of this order are required to wear no colored clothing, and to be strict vegetarians. On joining the society they are rewear no colored clothing, and to be strict vegetarians. On joining the society they are required to make over to it all their property, though they are allowed the use of a certain portion of it. Men and women are both admitted to membership in this society, which is extremely wealthy. In 1810 a plot was matured by the White Lotus to blow up the palace at Pekin, but as the conspirators entered the palace, a great gust of wind blew out all the lights. Intensely superstitious as they were, they fled Intensely superstitious as they were, they fled in a panic at this omen, and the plot was dis-covered. A large number of the conspirators were later captured and were promised pardon if they would eat meat. A number of them broke their yow to the society and did so, but paper and endow them with life. Others can hold their breath for an incredible length. They are said to go into a kind of a trance, the body stiffens and the face turns black, while the soul is supposed to leave the body and go off collecting all sorts of miscellaneous information. One of the members died while attempting this feat, and this fact caused great consternation and loss of prestige of the society. In 1876 Chinamen in one section of the country were thrown into a panic by an epidemic of

In 1876 Chinamen in one section of the country were thrown into a panic by an epidemic of a peculiar sort. Men's pig-tails dropped off, for no apparent reason, and at all sorts of times and places. It was finally discovered that certain members of the White Lotus, secretly armed with tiny scissors as sharp as razors, were causing all the trouble.

The Ko-Lao-Hwey is another strong, dangerous, and rapidly growing society, composed principally of soldiers, but with enough members among high officials and military men to bode ill in case of a rebellion. In 1870 a conspiracy of this society to blow up a powder magazine at Hukow was discovered, and the chief movers in the scheme were arrested and executed.

Another society of Mohammedans, the Hwey-Hwey-Jin also flourishes and has figured in some horrible massacres in the past. The neophytes for this order undergo some curious ceremonies, notably one of drinking large quantities of soap and water in order to purge themselves of pork, a method one can easily believe might prove effective.

The Tsai-li-Hwey is another order, principally a religious one, the members of which are allowed to wear only white clothes, and who abstain from liquor, tobacco and opium. The society is not important, and on account of their peculiarities the members have been easily recognized and prosecuted by the government, which makes membership in any secret society a penal offence, and for obvious reasons.

There are numerous other secret societies of which little is known, and semi-secret organizations in countless numbers.

Hundreds of People, Suffering from So-called Incurab Diseases, Permanently Restored to Health.

Dr. J. M. Peebles has done more for the afflicted than any man known to history.

His Home Treatment which cures the patient in the privacy of their own home without the knowledge of anyone, is creating a protound sensation because it is curing the hopeless and those pronounced incurable by doctors, and it is doing this without the use of drastic or poisonous drugs. Mrs. J. W. Henderson, of St. Johns, Washington, who suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness, was entirely cured by the Peebles' treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, Marionville, Pa., says she cannot express too much gratifued for the Peebles' treatment. Set on the grant of the grant

Your husband just died

DON'T DROP DEAD.

Just died of Heart Disease

If your heart is healthy there is no danger, but the moment the heart makes known its presence in the bosom it is unhealthy and out of tune.

DEATH MAY CONTINUE YOUR SLEEP FOREVER if you are subject to violent starts in sleep, or if dizzy spells or fainting spells trouble you, or if you feel depressed in throat or chest, especially after eating.

DOES YOUR BREATH COME SHORT after going up stairs, or after hurrying, or otherwise exciting yourself? Yes!

Then look out for Death for you are in danger.

SURE SIGNS OF A DISEASED HEART that cannot be mistaken are palpitation, or fluttering, skipping a beat, dark specks in the vision, swelled ankles, desire to sleep after eating, unnaturally cold hands and feet.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

LTHOUGH the vast mobs which infest Pekin and the larger cities of China, worked up to a state of frenzy and fanaticism have rendered impossible any satisfactory action by the available forces of the Powers, the great Chinese population proper is agricultural and naturally extremely peaceful and peace-loving. Agriculture, however, is most primitive and the wonder is how such an immense population can be supported from the soil, until the great economy practiced in all things is un-LTHOUGH the vast the great economy practiced in all things is understood. On the great plain of China, every available foot of land is available foot of land is utilized for growing some-thing and every particle of fertility returned to the soil. Waters are used for irrigation and in many cases laboriously distributed over the fields.

The Great Plain itself is one of the most wonderful sections of the globe. It is about 700 miles in length and varies from 200 to 400 miles in width, occupying the northeastern part of the empire, and containing over 200,000 square miles of wonderfully fertile soil. The most interesting feature of this plain is its enormous population, as it supports, according to the census of 1812, not less than 177 million human beings, making it the most densely settled of any part of the world of the same size, its inhabitants amounting to nearly two thirds of the entire population of Europe.

The most wonderful feature in the physical geography of China is the existence of a vast region of loess in this portion of the Empire. Loess is a very solid but friable earth, brownish yellow in color and is found in many places from 500 to 1000 feet deep. The loess hills rise in terraces from 20 to several hundred feet in height. Every atom of loess is perforated by tubes after the manner of root fibers, only the small direction of these little channels is always from above downward so that cleavage in the loess mass is invariably verticle. The loess region of China is perhaps the most broken country in the world, with its sheer cliffs and upright walls, terraces and deep-cut ravines. Owing to the ease with which it can be worked, caves made at the bases of straight cliffs afford homes to millions of people in the densely populated northern provinces where the Boxers have thus far been most active. Whole villages cluster together in carved-out chambers, some of which extend back more than 200 feet. The capabilities of defense in a country such as this, where an invading army must necessarily become lost and absolutely bewildered in the tangle of interlacing ways and where the defenders may always remain concealed or have innumerable means of escape is peculiarly significant at this time when consideration is being given to a conquest of China.

It may not be generally known that the Chinese were the disco and enlarged in the 13th century. It traverses the Great Plain and flows with but slight current for a distance of seven hundred miles. While built for purposes of communication its waters are used largely for irrigation and thousands of drains and creeks have been made to connect with it along its route.

The modes of irrigation are ancient and crude. One of the most picturesque is by means of the water-wheel, which is used where the land to be watered is well above the channel of the river. The wheel is turned by the force of the current and is perhaps thirty feet high, its buckets being sections of bamboo, which as they are raised by the stately motion of the wheel, empty their contents into troughs or ditches. Hollow bamboo pipes or tubes are sometimes used for distributing water over the fields. They rest upon wooden supports and branch in every direction from the source of supply. The chain pump is also a common means of lifting water, the chain running up from the water on a slant and being provided with little buckets at intervals, which as they reach the highest point and begin to descend, discharge their contents. These machines are worked by buffaloes or sometimes by human labor, a man working a crank with his feet something after the manner of riding a bicycle. The most primitive and laborious method is the ancient well sweep, such as is seen to-day on many an old New England homestead.

ANCIENT CALENDAR.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE first day of November is the feast of All Saints when their aid may be invoked both severally and collectively. Each country has its patron saint, as St. George for England, St. Andrew for Scotland, St. Patrick for Ireland, St. Denis for France, St. David for Wales, etc. Brand gives the following additional list of patron saints: St. Colman and St. Leapold for Austria; St. Wenceslaus for Bavaria; St. Canute for Denmark; St. Peter for Flanders; St. Martin for Germany; St. Louis for Hungary; St. Anthony for Italy; St. Stanislaus for Poland; St. Sebastian for Portugal; St. Nicholas for Russia; St. James for Spain; St. Eric and St. John for Sweden; St. Gall for Switzerland.

Eric and St. John for Sweden; St. Gall for Switzerland.

Every trade and profession has also its tutelar saint, which Brand enumerates as follows: St. Agatha presides over nurses; St. Catharine and St. Gregory are the patrons of literati, or studious persons; St. Catherine also presides over the arts in the room of Minerva; St. Christopher and St. Nicholas presides over mariners; St. Cecilia is the patron of musicians; St. Cosmas and St. Damian are the patrons of physicians and surgeons, also of philosophers; St. Dismas and St. Nicholas preside over thieves; St. Eustace and St. Hubert over hunters; St. Felicitas over young children; St. Luke is the patron of painters; St. Mathurin presides over divines; St. Valentine over lovers; St. Winifred over virgins; St. Ives over lawyers; St. Andrew and St. Joseph are the patron saints of carpenters; St. Catherine of spinners; St. Dunstan of goldsmiths; St. Goodman of tailors; St. Francis of butchers; St. John Port-Latin of booksellers; St. Leonard of locksmiths; St. Mattin of shoemakers; St. Wilfred of bakers; St. William of hatmakers; etc.

On the feat of St. Martin, or Martinmas, Nowember eleventh, the country people kill to swine and it is customary to send about pents of sausages.

A Thanksgiving greeting to you all, my dears, and although the day itself and the turkey are not quite here, I think we are all near enough to it to know that we have occasion to be thankful, that if we have not had everything we wanted we have not had a good many things we didn't want. Hoping that each and every one of you will sit down before a big turkey on the great day, I shall proceed to talk to you.

The first one is "Serious" of Dryden, Mich., who being a very sensible cousin of eighteen, I shall advise to receive the attention of an equally sensible man of thirty-three. However, she is to wait two years before thinking of matrimony.

Rural Maid, Lyons, Iowa.—Certainly a young woman of twenty-three should wear false teeth if she needs them, both on account of health and appearance. (1) I see no harm in wearing buds and blossoms at a dance. (2) You are rather young yet to "keep company" with a young man, whether he lives "fourteen miles to the north" or forty.

ought to know that much, at least.

Blue Bell, Fessenden, N. D.—Protestants and Catholics should not marry unless there is a perfect understanding and agreement on every point at issue, and the Protestant should talk to a priest first. When people love each other properly they should be willing to make sacrifices. Young men who treat you with indifference are to be avoided. It is vulgar to kiss gentlemen "occasionally" or otherwise.

Lulu, Lyon, Mon.—There is no set form for replying to congratulations or greetings or salutations of any kind. Say what you think is best. Do the same when the young man proposes to you. Goodness sakes, it seems to me you ought to know what to say to a man when he asks you to marry him.

Tomboy, Messer, Kas.—Tell the young man squarely that you do not care for his company. That ought to settle it. (2) The lady takes the Rose Bud, Cordell, Okla.—Don't marry before you are twenty-one. (2) For freckles mix a half pint turpentine with seven grammes of pulverized camphor and add two grammes of oil of sweet almonds. Buttermilk is also a good remedy.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE Winter Solstice of 1900 will fall out at about 33 minutes past 1 o'clock in the morning of the 22nd day of December, Washin gton Time. A figure of the heavens erected for that moment of time shows the 23rd degree of Cancer on the south merid in an and the 20th degree of the sign Libra on the Ascending horizon. All but two of the heavenly bodies will be below the horizon at that time; Venus, Mercury and Herschel, nearly together, in the 2nd house and Neptune in the 9th.

Mars in the 11th near the square of Herschel and Mercury, in the 2nd house, give indications of some unusual excitement in Congress over financial questions, both such as affect the currency and those pertaining to national expenditures for purpose of war. The luminaries so closely applying to the malific Saturn indicate a less satisfactory condition of the labor elements of the nation than could be wished and it is apprehended that considerable privations will come to the general working classes as the result of strife or controversy with employers; and national legislation will be urged to help adjust differences between labor and capital. There will be considerable suffering or sickness during the winter season among the poorer classes by reason of strikes and controversies. The government will be much troubled with both internal and foreign cares and the chief executive of the country is cautioned to be watchful against personal harm and also of his health conditions.

Venus rules the figure and she is in the 2nd without affliction, and the national purse will be properly replenished and the financial credit of the government among nations will be excellent.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR DECEMBER, 1900.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR DECEMBER, 1900.

DECEMBER. 1—Saturday. The day is peculiarly evil in most respects and prompts the postponement of very important beginnings; enter into no contract concerning houses or land; avoid thy landlord, and await a more fitting opportunity for thy dealings with aged or infirm persons; the afternoon may be better relied upon for furthering enterprises already in hand, when also deal with public officials and superintendents of large public works or officers of great corporations; artistic matters are more than usually favored.

2—Sunday. An excellent day for religious con-

2-Sunday. An excellent day for religious con-templation and discourse and for good appreciation of the merits of literary and scientific productions; the even-ing conduces to disagreements and controversy.

and conduces to disagreements and controversy.

3.—Monday. Push business vigorously this day, particularly such as pertains to the mechanical and building trades; travel, deal in cattle and metals and with chemists, physicians, military men and cutters; make contracts concerning masonry, plumbing, excavating, mining and the production of building materials; but do not expect much progress in the elegant pursuits, nor pleasure from the social or musical engagements.

4-Tuesday. Baffling circumstances attend the prosecution of literary pursuits; do not expect much favor from thy dealing with printers or publishers: sign no contracts about houses or lands, mines, or agricultural undertakings.

contracts about houses or lands, mines, or agricultural undertakings.

5-Wednesday. Avoid everything in the nature of a dispute or controversy on this day: keep the temper and be very deliberate and conservative rather than agressive in all thine affairs. The majority of persons claiming this as a birthday anniversary or who were born about the 8th of January, 3rd of March, 4th of June, 10th of July or 5th of September, of past years, are likely to be now in the midst of trying circumstances either in matters of health, business, or the social life; marriageable ladies so born, encounter at about this time many perplexities in matrimonial engagements and will be wise not to enter into any contract of such nature in these passing days; many of those so born who have already assumed the matrimonial yoke, are troubled seriously just now over the conditions, conduct, or the business affairs of their partners; males so born are cautioned against making any radical changes in their affairs or rupturing business associations; it will be much better for them to bear patiently the ills they have than to fly to others they know not of.

6-Thursday. Emphasizing the suggestion given

6-Thursday. Emphasizing the suggestion given for the preceding day, special caution is urged for this day against all manner of speculative ventures; do not purchase goods for trade nor make any beginning in any kind of commercial venture; beware of any project now presenting itself which offers promises of suddenly acquired wealth; don't purchase "gold bricks" or be otherwise deluded into parting with thy laboriously earned means.

7-Friday. Enter into no contract concerning real estate on this day; avoid thy landlord and postpone thy dealings with the aged.

Seamings with the aged.

Seamings with the artists and musicians, workers in silk, jewelers, tailors dressmakers and milliners, though the day is not generally one that can be recommended for making beginnings in matters of magnitude or importance.

Seamings with the aged.

9-Sunday. This day is quite propitious or the services appropriate; the early hours are the best and efforts of the clergy will meet more than ordinary approval and church contributions are likely to be liberal.

10-Monday. The first two-thirds of this day are the best, particularly for all classes of engagements with public officers or with executive officers of all large corporations; the afternoon is adverse to success in the elegant pursuits and does not promise much real enjoyment from the pursuit of pleasure or amusements.

ii-Tuesday. Bend all thine energies to business on this day; apply to persons high in office and to principals in large corporations for favor or advancement; make purchases for trade, open new stores, solicit financial advantages, and deal generally with persons of wealth and prominence.

12-Wednesday. Give preference to the forenoon for important transactions as to houses and lands, mines, and for dealing with farmers and those trading in farm products; the afternoon is contentious and excitable and caution is prompted for avoidance of disputes and over-hastiness in the conduct of all thine affairs; have care during the latter hours of the day not to contract bad colds or run risks of poor health from neglect in clothing.

13 Thursday. Use the middle hours of this day for pashing all business connected with the fine arts or that is concerned with furnishing amusement or gratification to mankind; do not make any purchases of goods for use or gain in the afternoon when thou with need to check inclinations for needless expenditures; losses are also more likely to come at this time to persons born about the 12th of March, 13th of June, or 14th of September, of past years.

14-Friday. Urge business vigorously during the their part of this day; make contracts, pursue literary and scientific undertakings; deal with booksellers, dawrers, printers, and mathematicians, and give the generales diligently to any intellectual or educational enteroise. The time is quite a fortunate one for persons claiming it as a birthday anniversary or for those born about the 10th of February, 11th of April. 14th of August or 15th of October, of past years; for such persons are likely to note marked improvement in their circumstances and have improved condition of health; marriageable ladies so are are favored in their matrimonial projects, many of them being earnestly sought for matrimonial mates, and many partaking in the fortunate developments in the affairs of male relatives upon whom they are dependent or in whom they are particularly interested.

15—Saturday. Consult and ask favors of aged persons; pursue antiquarian researches; engage in metaphysical studies and investigations and have dealings with government officials and with large corporate bodies or associations.

16—Sunday. One of the best Sabbath days of the month, especially so for the good and prosperity of church matters and for religious and moral improvement. The most of the suggestions given for the special birthdays in the 14th paragraph are equally appropriate here.

-17—Monday. Begin thine exertions of this day with the dawn and urge all general business; the day is peculiarly fortunate for transactions concerning real estate also for dealings in agricultural products and implements, building materials, coal, or metal ores; have surgical operations performed, consult thy dentist; buy machinery, employ mechanics and deal in hardware, electrical goods and chemicals and with cutlers, tailors and all workers in metals or glass.

18—Tuesday. Rather an indifferent day generally.

and all workers in metals or glass.

18—Tacsday. Rather an indifferent day generally, giving but little promise of advantage or profit from undertakings now begun.

19—Wedneaday. The forenoon hours are the best ones in this day, particularly for all manner of transactions pertaining to the elegant or artistic in life; urge sales of articles of dress or adornment, furnishings or decorations; the late afternoon and evening have but little to recommend them and should be avoided for any important correspondence.

20—Thursday. Let all persons practice nationed.

20-Thursday. Let all persons practice patience and keep a civil tongue; be slow to take offence, avoid all controversy and be not careless with fire; matters of much importance are best deferred; the evil propensities of mankind are likely to be here unusually excited and the commission of evil deeds more readily prompted; forgers are more active and signatures are to be more carefully scrutinized.

21—Friday. Begin this day with the dawn for it is one of excellent promise; bright and prosperous are the conditions for the merchant and traveler; the morning hours being really the best for money dealings, the beginning of great and noble undertakings, for entering upon new business and for all classes of trade.

22—Saturday. Be in no haste to begin thy labors in the morning, but after nine o'clock in the morning give every energy to business; give preferences to the mechanical pursuits and all manufacturing enterprises; deal in cattle, metals, glassware, chemicals, machinery, drugs, combustibles, and firearms.

23-Sunday. A day of no special promise, though the afternoon conduces to rashness, peevishness, and excitability, so observe caution as the day closes.

24-Monday. The elegant occupations are much favored on this day and the musicians, artists, and dramatists should improve the moments to their utmost; deal in fancy goods and articles that please and gratify, but have care not to over-step the grounds of prudence in expenditures as the day closes.

in expenditures as the day closes.

25—Tuesday. Christmas Day. An excellent day. Were it other than a holiday it would be recommended for vigorous use in forwarding commercial ventures and promoting intellectual and literary undertakings.

26—Wednesday. Do not expect much progress in the elegant pursuits in the first part of this day, but give preferences to engagements in the world of literature; bargain with persons in the laborious undertakings in the afternoon.

27—Thursday. Restrain thy temper, avoid travel, and have unusual care in all thy transactions with the pen and in contract-making; beware of fraudulent representations; sign no deeds, employ no servants, nor expect any satisfactory results from applications made to public officers at this time.

28 Friday. The middle hours are the best ones in this day, but there is little encouragement that can be offered towards the making of any new beginning; have care in all thou doest and pursue routine matters only; the afternoon is peculiarly even for any transaction concerned with real estate.

29—Saturday. This day offers some improvement over the preceding but is not recommended for any new beginning in life.

30-Sunday. A specially fortunate day, inducing mental activity and promoting pulpit eloquence and the enjoyment of literary productions.

31-Monday. Be up betimes and push thine efforts for pecuniary advantage in nearly all affairs of magnitude; give preferences to matters concerned with manufactures and construction; deal in machinery and chemicals and with persons in the mechanical trades.

"CALTHOS"

Prof. Laborde's Marvelous French Cure for Lost Manhood.

FIVE DAYS' TRIAL TREATMENT Sent Absolutely Free by Sealed Mail To All Sufferers.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

The only preparation known to science which really cures Lost Manhood is "CALTHOS," the marvelous French remedy discovered by Prof. Jules Laborde. It is controlled in this country by The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern which occupies a high and honorable place in the world of medicine. It is one of the largest and most responsible houses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

largest and most responsible nouses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all men suffering from Lost Manhood, Spermatorrhæa, Varicocele, Small Parts or Weakness of any nature in the Nerves or Sexual Organs, to send their names and receive a five days' treatment. This will prove the wonderful vitalizing powers of "CALTHOS." After using it five days the sufferers will find new vigor in their organs, new force in their muscles, new blood in their veins, new ambition, and rapid progress toward the buoyant feelings and sensations of younger days.

This liberal free offer is genuine. There is no swindling C. O. D. or Deposit Scheme connected with it. The five days' treatment is sent by scaled mail to all on request, wrapped in a plain package, and full printed instructions accompany the medicine, so that each patient becomes his own doctor and cures himself at home.

It doesn't make any difference what caused the weakness—whether bad habits in youth, or excess, or overwork, or business troubles. "CALTHOS" will effect a cure, no matter what big name the disease may be called by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in perfect confidence. Under no conditions will it make public the names of the thousands who have written testimonials telling of their restoration to robust manhood after other medicines and appliances have proved worthless. "CALTHOS" is regularly used in the French and German armies, and the soldiers in those countries have come to be perfect models of strength and vitality. Cures are effected at all ages from twenty to eighty years. There is no case (except where the stage of epilepsy or insanity has been reached) which it will not radically, quickly and permanently cure. Sexual weakness does not cure itself. It grows worse from week to week. Each day aggravates the mental and physical anguish.

REPAIRING OUTFIT Nº 1

GREATEST MONEY MAKER AND IN THE WORLD.

IN THE WORLD.;

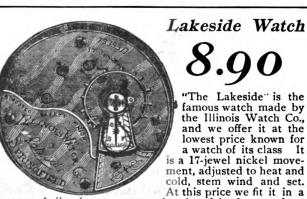

Hundreds of dollars are wasted every year in paying for repairs which could be done by you just as well as by the person you hire. "You," you will say, "I could do this work if I only had the tools." You have to hire the plumber or cobbler and pay him for his time while you stand around and look on, watching him do the work which you could do as well as he, but it is always that you have no tools. We have put together the best kit of tools for repairing which was ever seen, and we will iself the entire outfit for less than half the money for which you could buy it at any store. The outfit consists of for try-four first-class tools, as shown in the above cut, viz; I iron last for men's work; I iron last for boy's work; I iron last for men's work; I iron last for boy's work; I iron last for women's work; I iron last for children's work; I peg awl handle; I peg awl; I shoehammer; I shoeknife; I peg awl handle; I sewing awl handle; I sewing awl; I stabbling awl handle; I stabbling awl; bottle leather cement; I bottle rubber cement; I but ch bristles; I ball shoe thread; I ball shoe wax; I pkg, clinch nails, 6-8 in.; I pkg, heel nails; 4 prs. licel plates, assorted sizes; 6 harness needles; I harness and saw clamp; I box slotted rivets, assorted sizes; 1 rivet set for same; I harness and belt punch; I soldering iron, ready for use; I handle for same; I bar soldering all securely packed, together with directions for use, in a neat case. Send for Our Catalogue with 1,200 Pages, 17,000 Pictures, 70,000 Prices!

We are the largest store in the world doing an exclusive Mail Order business. No city sales; no agents; no branch stores. This is the original Catalogue business, founded 28 years ago; and our sales exceed those of all other mail order houses in the United States combined. Let us give you some figures: This store contains merchandise valued at $2,500,000. We occupy 25 acres of floor space, employ 2,000 clerks and have two million customers who buy from us by mail. From 15,000 to 35,000 orders and letters come to us daily. Our average daily shipments are 2,500 packages by freight, 4,000 by express and 6,500 by mail—a total of 13,000 packages daily. Annual sales, $12,000,000.

This business has been built by selling to users at wholesale prices. The price given in our catalogue for anything is about what your dealer pays his wholesaler. We save you the dealer's profit. We sell practically everything—all the things that you wear or use; most of the things that you eat—and we save you from 15 to 50 per cent on all. We guarantee that each article is exactly as represented; and we exchange, or pay your money back with all transportation, if you find it otherwise. We make it a pleasure to deal with us.

We have just issued a new catalogue—No. 68—the largest, finest, and most complete book of its kind ever published. It contains 1,200 pages with 17,000 pictures. It gives wholesale prices and truthful descriptions of 70,000 things. It will tell you about what your dealer pays for everything. This catalogue would be free if you could call for it, but we must pay 32 cents to mail it. Each book delivered costs us about $1. We ask you, therefore, to send us 15 cents—less than half the postage—and we will send you the catalogue by mail or express prepaid. If it disappoints you, we will send the 15 cents back. Almost any family can save $100 per year by it. The prices and pictures below are taken from this catalogue. If you order any article from this advertisement, please give the order number as stated under each article, e the goods will be promptly shipped.

The Predicament of Jarkins.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES E. BARNS.

Copyright, 1900 by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

LTHOUGH Jarkins believed himself born under a propitious star, and hence the luckiest man on earth, he had just proposed to the Major's charming daughter, and-angels and ministers of grace bear witness-he had been refused. It was this way.

Major Darth was a widower. After his wife's death, when the light of his life went out, the soldier took an aversion of society and left the genial circles of 'hill set" of Bombay for a mud bungalow in the heart of the Jeliwara district some forty miles up from Jeypour, where he could be midway between two military stations in his command. The compound was a sightly eminence, as eminences go in that part of India, overlooking the valley of the Kinda-wadibeautiful country to look upon but death to travel through without an arsenal and a medicine-chest. When his daughter Margy achieved womanhood, the boarding-school of Sussex could no longer hold her; she bravely hied herself to the East to find out what sort of a man her sire was. That was three years before. Now she was a fair personage of twenty, much in love with India because her father loved it; and Jarkins was the globe-trotting American who had penetrated this wilderness to pay his compliments to the hermit militarian, of whom he had heard much, and also, without so intending, to promptly fall in love with his daughter; and great was the fall thereof.

her cheeks and buoyancy of her disposition since she had come to rule over six stupid native servants, two Danish mastifs and an Arabian pony. But the true Devon stamina was in her veins, and much responsibility and quinine gave her maiden features a sharpness and a charm that was at once commanding and poetic. At least Jarkins thought so as he watched her through long twilights on the verandah before the bungalow, when the Major talked of and to himself, while Jarkins talked at the Major and to Margy, the latter resigned to both. Under circumstances which such mutual dependence inflicts, it is usually not long before young people find themselves quite neces sary to each other.

So Jarkins had said the delicious word in the shade of the deodars, and Margy had sighed back a tremulous negative. She was not thinking of herself, but of her father whose mainstay and solace in declining years she now was, and her marriage meant everything to him. Jarkins did not catch this occultism of the faithful daughter, men in love being usually narrow, regarding heaven and earth from just | Jarkins stared at the scoundrel, then became climax and that's the story.

There was some sort of a religious festival going on further up country, and every servant had begged an hour's leave of absence, for a Hindu can get very drunk in an hour in India if it is the right sort of a religious festival and the wrongest sort of palm-tody. At about three o'clock in the afternoon, just while the Major was absorbed with his reports, an orderly came to summon him over the hills; and it was Margy who, within three minutes, had brought to the front of the bungalow the Major's bay charger, and to the mystification of Jarkins, her own Arabian pony as well.

What was the matter? Could not Margy trust herself alone for an hour with Jarkins. man of honor, who had paid her the finest compliment that ever an honest man can pay to lovely woman? The lover, sensitized by fervency, saw almost an affront in this; but he was too wise to disclose it. Then as the Major, Margy and mounted orderly filed down the hill, Margy turned and called out, "Don't be alarmed, Mr. Jarkins. Remember the Danes!" it seemed like a satire on his loneliness. However, resignedly the globe-trotter stretched himself in the wicker steamer-chair and

In a very few moments, however, Jarkins felt conscious of a presence-a sort of telepathic conviction. Rising, he looked down the hill and saw emerging from the underbrush two of the most repulsive looking individuals that ever skinned lizards or knelt before clay idols. They were naked, save a clumsy breech-cloth, one with an empty sack over his bronzed shoulders, the other bearing a sort of Punjabi flute in his bony talons. Jarkins felt a queer stir of repulsion within him, but knowing that he was armed and seeing that they were not, he waited till he saw the yellow of their ambushed orbs, then shouted, "Well, what do you want!" Both men dropped in worshipful o' eisance as before a shrine. "Oh, powerful Sahib!" invoked the taller, "we are snake-catchers. We would serve you."

But the host made a forbidding gesture. "All stocked up," he said, remembering the contents of the Major's demijohn. "Come back tomorrow."

"But the great stranger Sahib has never beheld such a miracle," pursued the intruder, gathering closer. "See, O Sahib! With only pipe and stick we can go to yonder sandhill in plain sight and bring you back fifty cobras in fifteen minutes. The great Sahib shall time us. Oh, a most beautiful spectacle, sair! Fifty cobras in fifteen minutes, and only one rupee one!-for the miracle. Shall we go, Sahib?"

Now, being an American, Jarkins was even on the lookout for a new sensation, particularly if it implied some sportive stress. Besides was not one rupee cheap for good riddance? He held up a coin, then said, "All ready, you rascals. Now, go!"

As if pursued by a thousand ghosts of Siva the Destroyer, the swarthy pair turned and sped down the hill abreast, crossing the arid patch, leaping the stream, lost for a moment in a dense bamboo copse and emerging at the foot of a sand declivity dotted with ant-hills. Now in India the ant-hill is a wonderful structure. It rises out of the earth like a clay smokestack. as if there might be a community of dug-out people underneath. Over the mouth of the first of these curious cones the man with the sack drew the receptacle, then began singing in a weird minor and tapping the ant-hill with his staff, while the other fakir accompanied him on the pipe. Soon the sack was seen to suffer some inner agitation, for several five-foot lengths of cobra had come forth from their hiding and fallen to the bottom of the hempen trap. On to another hill the snake-catchers ran, repeated the weird incantations which reverberated over the wilderness; then after visiting about twenty of these hills, started on a dead run for the bungalow.

"Jove!" mused Jarkins. "That's a clever trick, I'll double the wage." And he did.

The bag appeared to be about half full, and from the riot within it was plain that the prisoners were mad all through. Pantingly the ferred her patient to the bungalow. nen approached, but Jarkins shudderingly Fair Margy had lost some of the pippin of flipped the coins far out towards them. "It's all right," he said. "I'm entirely satisfied. Take 'em away again."

"But the cobras are yours. O glorious Sahib!" said the spokesman, still advancing. "We are going to let them loose right here to count them before your eyes so that you see that we speak true talk and do not lie like the accursed varmin-eaters down the valley. Sair, you have paid us each one rupee to see the miracle. That shows that the Sahib is a great prince in his country and pays liberally for his pleasures. Now, it is a long way back, sair, and we are tired unto death itself. But we will be generous to the stranger Sahib. We will take the cobras back again for twenty rupees. If not, we will let them all loose right here."

Jarkins arose, his face coloring with anger. You let those cobras loose here," he shot back, "and I'll put a bullet through each of you. Understand?"

"But bullets, sair, may miss us while fifty mad cobras, Sahib, will make you dance like the fool Mohammedans at a Rhamadan feast. Make it fifteen rupees, Sahib!"

one point of view-their own. But there came illuminated. "The Danes!" he muttered. "I'll take Margy's advice. Wait till I get the monev!" he calls out and disappeared through the open window, passing to the rear where he unchained the great mastifs, seizing them by the collars and leading them stealthily forward.

But suddenly one of the dogs sniffed significantly, gave a long rolling bay, and away he tore, leaving Jarkins sprawling on the veranda. Now Hindu coolies and Danes do not affiliate. the one by religion and nature a dog-hater and the other by training a cooley-baiter. With a terrific cry both men turned and started down the hill, the pair clinging to the bag of cobras which immediately split and began to spill out five-foot lengths of vicious contortion that kept the pursuing bounds very busy dodging them. By the time the men reached the foot of the hill there was a perfect forest of these writhing, rioting beasts with glaring eyes and distended hoods, whirling along almost on their very tail-tips, striking at everything within reach with gleaming fangs, and just at that instant, unconscious of all harm, around the edge of the bamboo-copse came Margy on her Arabian pony at full gallop, suddenly finding herself right in the shocking thick of this belligerent army, her mount leaping and rearing, the girl's face perfectly colorless with sudden terror.

Jarkins gave a wild shout, dashed back into the bungalow, snatched the Major's sword from the scabbard, then emerged. In the meantime Margy had been thrown from her pony, which had gone tearing down the valley, and fainting, lay quite motionless on the chinawhite clay, these frenzied reptiles keeping up their hideous orgy all about her. Insane with apprehension lest she had been or might be bitten before rescued, Jarkins dashed forward in the very face of death, and naturally the infuriated cobras made for him. Indolent as was the bluse globe-trotter by nature, Jarkins had enjoyed a college athletic training which might be now the saving of two lives. With splendid nerve he advanced, the razoredged sword flashing in the declining sun, then began his slashings right and left as a man swishes off the heads of ripe grain with his cane, parrying, lunging, cutting his way to the still side of Margy who came to just in time to see the final vanquishing.

Jarkins threw aside his dripping sword, then almost benumbed with terror, reached down and lifted the frail form in his arms, calling out, "Oh, Margy, Margy! Have you been hit? Were you bitten?"

"No!" returned the other faintly, "but"and here she gazed into his face with an inscrutable look, "but you were!"

"What?" Jarkins felt a sudden sickness come over him.

"I know it-the whites of your eyes are going drab. Down-quick. Where is it?"

"I don't know-I think just above the ankle." The man had dropped like a log, the brave girl tearing off his shoe and stocking, disclosing a bluish patch dotted with four deadly points of crimson.

"Your handkerchief, quick! Bind below the knee!" She seized a small stick and made a sort of turnkey of it; then leaping up, she seized the sword and prodded the trunkless head of the largest cobra in sight. Bending down, without any of that repulsion which characterizes the creature of northern climes, the girl deftly split open the head of the cobra, laying bare a round porous bone which slipped out easily into her palm. "It is a native trick," she said. "You know, every cobra carries his antidote just above and back of the eyes. Don't know whether it will work on a white man, but-" She laid the curious bit of whiteness to the wound and saw with a species of triumph that it instantly clung there like a "Hold it tight!" she added, then leaping up she dashed up to the bungalow, returning at full speed with a goblet quite brimming with brandy. "Drink-quick-all of it!" she gasped. Five minutes later Jarkins lapsed into unconsciousness, and with the help of the native servants, now returning from the festival and none too fit for service, Margy trans-

It was almost dark before Jarkins ca of his trance, with a fevering thirst and a mortal wonder whether he was dead or alive. "Oh, you are all right now," Margy, his nurse, interrupted his delirious queries. "I knew you were safe the moment I saw the bone cling to the wound and suck it dry. Besides, it could not have been more than a scratch. Tell me all about it. Where were those jackal-faced pagans? You see, I was dazed when I rounded the bamboos and found myself in the very jaws

The globe-trotter raised his eves. "Brave little Margy!" he exclaimed gratefully. "But first tell me why you went away. Were you afraid to be alone with me for an hour—you who proved so fearless in a terrible crisis?"

"I-afraid of you?" A ringing little laugh dispelled the illusion. "I went with fatherto-well, to ask him about-what you asked me the other day."

Jarkins caught the tender glance and it stung him to repentance. "Oh, Margy, Margy!" he cried. "Really, your refusal was because you thought of your good father first and of yourself afterward?"

"And you spoke to him-you told him he oved you, dear?"

"Yes." came the whisper.

"Bravest, best of women!" moaned Jark: But tell me, for God's sake, Margy, what the Major say?"

Margy bent low. "He said-he said-"Good evening, my dears!"

It was the voice of the Major that interr ed, advancing from the veranda with clank spur and a look of quiet triumph upon calm countenance.

enoted, but the battle had gone against them. He glanced through a number of letters vithout a change of expression, then as he laid ne down a smile played about his mouth. Acting upon our privilege we will read it:

DEAR GOVERNOR.

Being unable at this time to see you in person, I send you a few lines instead, which, as a riend, I hope you will heed. In my travels bout the State I find the opinion prevailing hat you intend to include in your usual batch of Christmas pardons, young Jeter. Now, I m reliably informed—by such men as Kingsson, Buzbee, Connolly and Frazier—that if you lo this you will sign your own death-warrant, politically, not only for re-election as Governor, but for the United States Senate later. Public sentiment is in favor of the execution of the sentence in Jeter's case; and no man with political aspirations can afford to disregard the wishes of a majority of his constituents—right or wrong. But from a moral standpoint, 'Vox populi, vox Dei' you know. With best wishes, I am,

Yours for victory,

L. C. A." DEAR GOVERNOR.

Having gone through the mail, the Governor called his secretary and gave him dictation. Then, while waiting for the letters he drew up several pardons, among them Jeter's. He had just finished when the Secretary came in.

"The 11.00 o'clock mail, sir," he said, placing some letters on the desk.

"All right, Martin," replied the Governor, drawing them toward him. One, marked "Personal," which the secretary had not opened, he read last. As he proceeded his brow darkened and his lips were compressed. Finally he rose and strode quickly back and forth. Pausing at last he re-read the letter; then stepped to the desk, picked up Jeter's pardon and tearing it in pieces threw it into the waste-basket. At this moment the secretary entered, note-book in hand.

"I can't make this word out, sir. Please As his eyes rested on the Governor's face the words died on his lips. He had never seen such an expression there before, and the voice and manner were equally strange as, with a wave of his hand toward the door, the Governor said:

"When I want you, Mr. Martin, I will call you."

"Bless my soul! what has happened?" gasped the secretary as, closing the door hastily behind him, he dropped into a chair.

Let us see what it was that had so disturbed this usually even-tempered man. This was what he read:

"MY DEAR 'JED':

It is altogether unnecessary for me to tell you at this late day of my love and admiration for you. Since the days when we were little lads together, when you fought my battles for me, your interests, your joys and your sorrows have been mine. They were so in the old days, they are so still; and it is because of this that I write you. Few, if any, remember all the persecutions, great and petty, which were heaped upon you, which at last drove you from your native State and would have followed you if it had been possible—persecutions rendered possible even in our land by the power which money affords the unscrupulous and cruel. Listen, while I refresh your memory—though if it requires refreshing you are more or less than human. Do you remember a poor boy who years ago lost a prize at school, it being awarded by favor to the son of a man of wealth? Do you recall how, a few years later, this same It is altogether unnecessary for me to tell years ago lost a prize at school, it being awarded by favor to the son of a man of wealth? Do you recall how, a few years later, this same boy, grown to young manhood, lost a much-coveted government appointment because of the counter-influence of this rich man? Later still, do you remember how hard he fought it even to gain admission to the bar because of this man's opposition? And yet later, do you remember how those two, father and son, who had caused you to be defrauded of the little prize at school, contrived to wrest from you the prize of your life, the woman you loved and who loved you? (As I said at the time, and subsequent events proved, not so much because the son loved her as because they both hated you.) They hated you with a deadly hatred, because they had injured you without cause, and swore to drive you into the penitentiary, the poorhouse, or the grave. The father, you know, is dead, but the son lives. You know how, after a few years, he drove his wife, by his brutal treatment of her, into a convent, but perhaps you have not heard that some time since he drove her son their only child from perhaps you have not heard that some time since he drove her son, their only child, from home. If the patient, gentle woman was una-ble to endure his cruel treatment, how much less the young man, who is a chip of the old and older blocks.

"Now, do you remember the unfinished oath you swore, through white lips, on the day when, a crushed and broken man, you turned your back upon all that earth held dear—'A day of reckoning will come, and then!'—It has come! It is within your power to pay a portion of this heavy reckoning! It will not be revenge, but retribution. You have in your hands a murderer convicted under the name of Thomas Jeter. His real name is William Belden, Jr. He has been convicted and I believe it was a just verdict, for he is his father's son; he is an Ishmaelite. This is the only debt I believe you have never paid. I appeal now to the chum of my boyhood who, as vanquished, never was known to yield; not to him whose the chum of my boyhood who, as vanquished, never was known to yield; not to him whose eyes, as victor, I have seen fill with tears at the cry for mercy. In justice to the public and to yourself, allow the law to take its course.

Faithfully yours, Tony."

In the afternoon mail was a small package for the Governor also marked "personal." As he removed the last wrapper there looked into his eyes the pictured eyes of a woman. The face portrayed there was one of rare loveliness, and as he gazed he caught his breath with a half sob. Once he made a movement as though to press it to his lips, but restrained himself, and placing it tenderly upon the desk took up and read the lines which accompanied it:

"For My Friend (the Governor):
"When we parted, you returned the en-closed picture to me and said, 'If I can ever serve you in any way, were it to the laying down of my life, let me know, and if it is in my power it shall be done. The occasion has been long in presenting itself, but it has come at last. Lest you should have forgotten, not only the promise but she to whom it was made, I send the miniature as a reminder. Unless the nature I knew has been sadly warped, you will harken to my plea. Spare the prisoner called Thomas Jeter, convicted of murder! He is my son, my only child! I remember him as a little prattler. They tell me his guilt has not been conclusively proven; I believe him innocent. He has had much to make him bad, but I do not believe he is as bad as this. Do not think to strike the father through the son (if such a thing were possible with you) for bethink to strike the father through the son (II such a thing were possible with you) for believe me you would be the greater sufferer. Revenge is sweet to ignoble, not to noble natures. As a Sister I am dead to the world; as a mother my heart bleeds, and so I sign myself, 'A MOTHER'."

Again as in the morning the Governor paced back and forth in great agitation. "I could forgive the brute his treatment of me," he muttered, "but his abuse to her! O, it is hard! hard! to ask this of me! I am only an ordinary mortal man! I would rejoice to know he suffered one-tenth the agony he has brought upon others."

He sank into a chair, dropped his arms and his frame shook. When at last he lifted his face the hard look which had been there since morning was gone.

Martin noticed this with a feeling of relief when he came in some minutes later and was handed Jeter's pardon, with instructions to attend to it at once.

"And I must beg your pardon for speaking to you as I did this morning, Martin," he added. I was greatly worried and forgot myself."

He put his overcoat and hat on and went out into the dusk. As he passed a church childish voices, practicing their Christmas music, floated out to him, singing, "Peace on earth, good will toward men", and the Governor prayed for the heart of a little child.

Late the following night, as the Governor sat with the miniature in his hand and a far-away look in his eyes, there came a knock at his door. He opened it to receive a summons to the bedside of a man who had been fatally wounded in a Christmas Eve brawl. The fellow, well known in police circles, had expressed a wish to see the Governor (who had once pardoned him) as being "The d-dest best man I ever come across!" Before dying he confessed, among subsequent investigation proved the truth of his statement.

As we have taken the liberty of reading letters received by the Governor, we will now read the concluding sentence of a letter which he wrote the day after Christmas: "It has been the happiest Christmas I have known since you told me so long ago (was it in another life?) that you loved me."

THE THROW OF A ROPE.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY OSCAR S. SEAVER.

HUCK time at the Conry ranch is always a season of rare recreation to the saddle-sore traveler, not only for the well appointed board but also the evening smoke talk on the ranch house verandah, over which Conry, who has the name in the Madison Valley of breeding the finest road horses shipped east, presides something after the fashion of old King Arthur over his Round Table. Horns and hoofs make the theme of the talk and no occasion has yet lacked a pointed story from the veteran stockman's wild life of hill and plain.

Upon one singing summer evening when the glowing ends of a dozen cigars were but a trifle more flery than the red canopy the setting sun had cast over the valley, an aspirant in the art of rope-throwing was hot on the trail of how to lasso a hitching post some yards away. He was bearing hardily the bantering and jesting of the dozen onlookers when Conry, heretofore strangely silent, came to his relief. With a quiet word or two he actually had the boy swinging his rope in so apt a way that shortly he sent it curling snakily around the coveted

"Like an old han' that last," declared the old man, and then turning to his audience he said: "I laughed at Bob Ford when he begun throwing a rope and I haven't got over that jolt yet.'

Almost every yellow cigar end could bow recognition to the name Bob Ford. He had come into the Rocky Mountain country single handed and by grit had won his way. But

Kansas City, Mo., Nov. 30, '99.

Dear Sirs:—"During three years I was frequently attacked with severe spells of sickness; many of these sick spells kept me in bed, dangerously ill, from three weeks to three months, under the constant care of the best physicians in Kansas City.

The doctors pronounced my case gall stones, and said I could not live without a surgical operation, to which I would never consent. In May, 1898, I had the most severe attack; then the doctors said I could not live. It was during this illness that a friend suggested I try Dr Kilmer's Swamp-Root. I began to take Swamp-Root regularly, and when I had taken only three fifty-cent bottles I began to feel fine and was able to do more housework than I had done in four years. Continuing the use of Swamp-Root, it has made a new woman of me. I have only had one slight attack since I began to take Swamp-Root, and that was caused by being drenched with rain and catching cold. This stomach trouble has bothered me for about twenty years and had become chronic. I am mow 44 years of age and feel much younger than I did ten years ago, My friends say I am looking younger every day. Five years ago I only weighed 104 pounds; I now weigh 185 pounds and can do more housework than ever before in my life. I freely give this testimonial for the benefit of those who have suffered as I have."

Neuralgia, nervousness, headache, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, rheumatism, a dragging pain or dull ache in the back, weakness or bearing down sensation, profuse or scanty supply of urine, with strong odor, frequent desire to pass it night or day, with scalding or burning sensation,—these are all unmistakable signs of kidney and bladder trouble.

If there is any doubt in your mind as to your condition, take from your urine on rising about four ounces, place it in a glass or bottle and let it stand twenty-four hours. If on examination it is milky or cloudy, if there is a brick-dust settling, or if small particles float about in it, your kidneys are in need of immediate attention.

Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are sleeplessness, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, plenty of ambition but no strength.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take and used in the leading hospitals, recommended by physicians in their private practice, and is taken by doctors themselves, because they recognize in it the greatest and most successful remedy that science has ever been able to compound.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-Root is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at the drug stores everywhere.

EDITORIAL NOTICE—Swamp-Root, the great Kidney, Liver and Bladder remedy, is so remarkably successful that a special arrangement has been made by which all of our readers who have not already tried it may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail. hinted by the Mexican foreman, Romero, no a Spanish beauty for whom Conry had risked word of it had come from "the old man."

"Bob was crazy over that game," began Conry, "but he made a pretty onery mess of it. I laughed at him till I went clean off my feed seeing him try to handle a rope. After the first off he didn't perform where I could coral him, for he didn't like to be driv', and I figured he'd quit, but right there, boys, I'd clean missed the trail.

"It was old man Romero's work. Been laughing in his sleeve for some time I cal'ate. He likes to get a cinch on me and then stan' off and see how I take it. But I've had that old greaser a kickin' and a squealin' like a green cayuse so I cal'ate I don't owe him anythin'.

"Romero took a liking to Bob more particularly after I got to cussing him fer a tenderfoot. I seed he was gritty an' liked him. He warnt halter broke, that's all. He could ride had a pony cut up bad by one of them once, like a Injun horse thief and learned to ride in and say boys, if a smart little cow pony can't a herd like an old han'. Liked his business? Bob took just as much fun cutting out a 'maverick' as he did picking at a mandolin he had and singing greaser songs to it. I seed there wasn't anythin' the boys wouldn't do for Bob, but old man Romero I cal'ate was showing him tricks about a rope that I didn't see.

"Romero can throw a rope just about as close as he can shoot and he wins all his baccy and spirits beating the boys shooting through knotholes in rail fences. Furthermore he can break horses better than any man I ever seed: and that's from the Rio Grande to Oregon: but what I didn't know was that he could break tenderfoots.

"Well that's what he did for Bob Ford, as near as I can figure, and the next summer when I took Sally and her mammy pleasuring to the Park', a little incident occurred where I had to own to Bob, if ever a man did, that he had me in a ditch fer fair."

Sally was a queen of the hill country. She was a fine, strong tomboy of a girl the summer asked, p'inting. Conry mentioned, and ruled unrelentingly all in her domain. She not only rode as well as many of her minions, the cowboys, but was a dead shot and when on roping bent no colt or while the story that was now brewing had been calf was free to go its way. Sally's mother was

Sally had tried her rope on Bob Ford once for fun to the end of almost choking him, but he had laughed and had been overheard to say to her deferentially, that it was no use roping him again for she had done that the very first day he saw her. For many days after Bob had been ignored by the annoyed queen, but as the owners of the glowing cigar ends knew that Bob Ford had gone along with the party to the Yellowstone Park, it was of course unnecessary to tell them all this now.

"You know those scrawny, wild eyed old cows," continued Conry, "all bunches and bones and gettin' poor watching fer a chance to do you dirty? You just put the blame of nine out of ten stampedes to them fer the're vicious. I get away from danger, what chance would you have on foot? I cal'ate you fare better in the loving embrace of a 'roach back' grizzly.

"To say the least, the disposition of this particular element of a herd ain't much to brag of, and up on the Ruby, which is a pretty rough country and poor as dirt can be they are about to the limit. You see they starve all winter; the're just gettin' on in the spring when the sun dries up the feed and they begin to starve again. That don't put beef on them and it puts blood in their eyes, especially the old cows with weaning calves.

"It was with one of these wild-eyed critters, when we were hitting the trail over the Rubies, that my gal Sally got into a tangle, and it was Bob Ford who proceeded to do the necessary untangling in a way that almost gave me the blind staggers.

"When we started I noticed Bob wore his rope on the horn of his saddle.

"What are you going to do with that," I

"Mend harness I cal'ate," he said grinning. "Well, the occasion came quick enough when he showed me what he could do with it.

"It was coming right on the stock range, up between the sage and the timber, and I left

Sally to follow pretty far out while I give my pony the rowells for to hold up the wagon which I seed had just forded a creek. I didn't like to leave her, yet she was well mounted on Ben and I seed no harm. But when Bob yelled to me while we were hobbling the horses fer the night, 'Ben's struck a badger hole out there and Sally's off,' I seed danger. There's danger out of the saddle when there ain't any in it, especially among cattle. Sally was too good a rider to be throwed. So I knew Ben was done for.

"Bob was in his saddle and yelling. His little roan was kicking territory from under him and my little mare was doing her best to dispose of an equal amount. When I got the lay of the prices: land my hair riz under my hat. Black feet and cut throats on the northern trail were just men but this was one of those scrawny wild eyed old cows a chargin' down on Sally.

"She saw her danger, gave one scream that cut me like a knife, and ran. Bob and I aimed at getting between and heading the cussed thing off.

"That was a hard run; the hardest in my life and Bob's too I cal'ate, and when we got to close quarters I seed we warn't going to make it. One minute I thought Bob had a chance but the next I seed him miss headin' off and swing his pony in for the long chase. I came behind cussing my luck for leaving my gun at the wagon and cutting up my pony bad.

"It was just a few minutes boys, but it seemed like an hour of hell. There was Sally running like a colt and that she devil plunging after doing her most to kill her. There was Bob close to his pony's neck and the pony racing like mad. Bob was pulling the beast down all right but pretty soon Sally begun staggering. Bob was cool. There was something in the way he rode that showed he hadn't given up

"Then just as I expected to see Sally mangled and bleedin' I seed Bob reach for his rope and fix it fer a throw. Well I went clean sick at that chance, but I didn't have a very long spell, fer I seed Bob swing cool and steady, leaning forward and urgin' on his pony. Then he forward and urgin' on his pony. Then he made his throw and at the same time Sally fell. I just friz in my saddle. I heard the whistle and seed coil after coil straighten out till only the last loop and noose was left. Then I knew Bob's throw was true. That last loop and noose dropped like a snake, and none too soon, clean and square over the two horns and whipped up taut. Bob's pony bunched all right and when the tug came that bloody wild-cow was ripped up on her hind legs and sent rolling on her back with a twist and a bang that would have killed good stock.

rolling on her back with a twist and a bang that would have killed good stock.

"Sally was cryin' and pretty weak when I got her to camp but her mammy said she would come round in a spell, so I struck back to where Bob was having the prettiest fight with a rope that I've seed in some time. Hooves and seshro were rettling for a spell like dige shaken in a that I've seed in some time. Hooves and seshro were rattling for a spell like dice shaken in a dice box. I watched long enough to feel pretty sick over the way I'd laughed at him about throwing a rope, and then I took a hand. I had my gun along that time and the proceedings were short and to the p'int.

"'What did you do that fer?' asked Bob disapp'inted like.

app'inted like. "'Becuz' says I, 'It's the only thing you can't do with that rope of yours.'
"Bob flushed up at that and begun on a

Bob says to-day it was great luck, but I've seed him make as good throws since and every time if old man Romero was there he'd sort of grin and look my way. I cal'ate the old greaser tried to get a cinch on me—well boys I cal-'ate he did."

Once launched, Conry could not forbear telling the sequel of the little episode which had so narrowly missed being a tragedy. Sally could not tell how thankful she was to the could not tell how thankful she was to the man who saved her life by the miraculous throw of a rope. Bob repeated that he had been roped hard and fast the very first day he had seen 'Miss Sally,' and that was the secret of it all. Ropes got to whistling so in this sort of repartee, Conry says, "that it wasn't long before the coils got snarled and the two young people had to come to him with it. But it warn't no tangle at all" concluded the old stockman, his bronze face wrinkling in a smile. stockman, his bronze face wrinkling in a smile, "just a true lovers knot, and say boys, that's tougher than a diamond hitch any day. So I simply let it alone.

NYTHING needed down town this morning, Ethel."

The question was merely perfunctory and Mrs. Clyde knew it. In the early days of their married life she had thought differently and sometimes asked her husband to bring home articles she needed. All that had passed, however, but still the question which pleasantly followed the parting kiss continued. This morning a revolutionary spirit fired her soul for a moment. She replied with seeming negligence: "Yes-no-not exactly, but I would like five

"Five dollars! May I ask what you want to lo with five dollars?"

"Oh, lots of things," she answered, negligently.

"Ethel, did you know that money is very hard just now?"

"I suppose it must be."

"I am sure I have not wasted five dollars in as many years," he said.

"I simply need it, Robert. I am wearing my best shoes when a pair of house slippers would save them. I want-well, here is a list of things that are absolutely essential," and she handed her husband a slip of paper on which were noted the following articles, with probable

Slippers, Ribbon, Postage and stationery, Lace, cambric, etc., 1.00

"I thought you said five dollars."
"I did. I could get along with that."
"Could you not get along without all except the slippers, for instance?"

"Possibly." Mrs. Clyde's voice was congealing, still her husband ventured on another question.

"Why has not this demand occurred before?"
"Simply because I have earned the money for such things myself, hitherto, but Dr. Alston tells me that making button-holes is bad for me and advises me to give it up." As a look of concern overspread her husband's countenance she hastened to say, "It is nothing serious,

"But why did you do this unnecessary work, Ethel? I did not know it."
"I hated to ask you for money. Before I was married I had a stated salary as teacher. It was hard to return to the position of a dependent—to ask for money and have it doled out to me as if I were a child."
"Well don't feel the trans. Ethel. I don't me as if I were a child."

"Well, don't feel that way, Ethel. I don't like to have you. All that I have is yours you know. 'With all my worldly goods I thee endow,' he quoted softly, bending over his wife and kissing her with new tenderness. Then straightening up and drawing on his gloves he was about to depart when he said:

"Oh, I forgot," and taking from his vest pocket a couple of bills laid them before his wife. "There are three dollars, Ethel. Try to make that do."

"Thank you." she said, pleasantly, but the

"Thank you," she said, pleasantly, but the look that followed Mr. Clyde from the room was "composed of many conflicting emotions," as the novelists say.

The Clydes were not poor; far from it. Mr.
Clyde was of the firm of Dean & Clyde, which Clyde was of the firm of Dean & Clyde, which was regarded as doing a particularly flourishing business, and this was the case. The junior partner was level headed and enterprising, Mrs. Clyde prudent and careful. Both liked to dress well and they agreed in their taste for social life. They had no children, their house was prettily furnished; they kept one servant. But how these tastes and essentials taxed the wits of Mrs. Clyde to maintain few realized, least of all her husband. least of all her husband.

"Probably he thinks my bonnets, boots and gloves grow like bushes, or toads," thought she a little bitterly, as she walked into town that afternoon instead of taking a car, although it was fully a mile and she was feeling far from

As she had but three dollars she was perforce compelled to do without some of the articles she had called essentials. The cambric was for sleeve linings to an old dress she was herself remodeling. That she must have. She must have the slippers or soon her boots would not be fit for church and calling purposes. She could do without the lace and the ribbon, but these things would lighten up her old costumes so much! Relinquishing them with a sigh she banished fifty cents from her third item of postage and stationery, and the slaughter was complete one hour's time she returned home with

In one hour's time she returned home with empty purse and sinking stomach—for she was both tired and hungry—just as Mr. Clyde appeared from the opposite direction. Mrs. Clyde had seen him step from the car and they went into the house together. Tea was ready and they sat down to the table immediately.

"Well, Ethel," said Mr. Clyde, pleasantly, unfolding his napkin, "you went down street this afternoon, I see."

"Yes," she answered, a little ungraciously it must be admitted. Mr. Clyde did not notice:

must be admitted. Mr. Clyde did not notice; he rushed blindly to his fate.
"Spent all your money, I'll be bound," he said jokingly.

"I did."
"Ethel, are you sick?" he asked, anxiously.
"You look quite flushed. I am afraid you tired yourself. Why did you not take a car home?"
"Simply because I had no money."
"No money, and I gave you—" Mr. Clyde stopped suddenly, barred by the possible inadequacy of the sum he had given her.
"Yes three dollars. I hought shoes combrid."

"Yes, three dollars. I bought shoes, cambric and fifty cents worth of stationery. Result, nothing left for car fare or lunch, though I was simply famishing. So you must excuse me if I am a little cross, Robert."

Mr. Clyde looked thoughtful while his wife

Mr. Clyde looked thoughtful while his wife took fitful bites of bread and butter. He saw that she was out of temper and he thought it exceedingly unpleasant that Ethel must take the tea table as the place of exhibit. "Why didn't you call at the store for more money?" he asked at length. "Because I would not humble myself the second.

money?" he asked at length.

"Because I would not humble myself the second time."

"Ethel is it humbling yourself to ask for what is yours as much as mine? I should think it a simple matter to ask you for money."

"Suppose you try it awhile."

The words came clear and incisive, and struck Mr. Clyde as distinctly unpleasant. Still he answered calmly,

"It would be impossible, Ethel. I could not do business."

"Yes you could," she said, eagerly. "You need only come to me for your personal expenses. Just try it for one week and see how you like it."

"I should like it first rate, I know."

"Very well." Mr. Clyde bit his li "Very well." Mr. Clyde bit his lips tightly, took the bills, while he mentally concluded to let the cigars remain unpaid for until the following week. But he did not, for at second thought the plan appeared to be dishonorable, so he paid out two dollars of the three and remained the capitalist of one hundred cents, turning them over in his mind many times on turning them over in his mind many times on his way to the office in his endeavors to make them last as long as possible. "Where away?" called a gay voice at his el-bow. "Those meditations must mean some sort of an upheaval in the firm of Dean &

Cly le."

"Not at all," replied Mr. Clyde, with some embarrassment of manner at considering what they did mean. "When did you arrive?"

"Just down for the day." Mr. Lee lived in the neighboring city.

"Will you lunch with me at Graham's?" was on the tip of his tongue, but he did not speak the words; instead he said, hesitatingly, "Well, hope I shall run across you again," and hurried away.

"Wonder what ails Clyde. Perhaps I hit the right nail on the head with my blundering pleasantry," thought Mr. Lee. "I wonder if Dean and Clyde are sound."

Mr. Clyde went on to the office and forgot

Mr. Clyde went on to the office and forgot his troubles until night. He bought a daily paper, paid his tailor for mending a three-cornered tear in his coat, bought some extra fine peaches on his way home and entered the door with only three cents in his pocket.
"Well, I will ask for some more in the morning," he thought, but when morning came he could not make up his mind to do so and accordingly went to the office without money.

This day was a series of mortifying incidents from putting his hand into his pocket to pay the bootblack and finding nothing, to asking credit of Graham for a cup of coffee at midday, a serious headache having resulted from these vexing questions of finance. At six o'clock he vexing questions of finance. At six o'clock he encountered his most intimate friend, Arthur Cross, almost at his very door.

"You were coming to dinner and to spend the night with us?" asked Mr. Clyde, heartily.

"I really had not got as far as that."

"Well, you are here and Ethel and I will see that you go no far her to-night."

you go no farther to-night." Willing to be entreated and not noticing the equivocal sentence, Mr. Cross entered the house and was cordially greeted by Mrs. Clyde.

After dinner the friends chatted and smoked together until Mr. Clyde proposed that they go

"Will you go with us, Ethel?" he asked, after his friend had acceded to the proposal.

"Thank you," she returned, pleasantly, "but I do not feel quite well and besides I have a letter to write; but I hope you and Mr. Cross will enjoy yourselves." Then she arose to leave the room, seemingly unconscious of her husband's efforts to catch her attention, that he might efforts to catch her attention that he might Wife carries the pocket-book, you see," to his friend with a ghastly effort at pleasantry. "So I see," returned Mr. Cross, with equal effort and similar result.

"Ten?" asked Mrs. Clyde, crisply. "Surely you will not need a quarter of that." Handing her husband a couple of bills which she took you will not need a quarter of that." Handing her husband a couple of bills which she took from a pocket-book mysteriously appearing from the back folds of her pretty house dress, Mrs. Clyde disappeared up the stairway to her own room, leaving Mr. Cross staring at his friend, who bit his lips in vexation but said nothing.

friend, who bit his lips in vexation but said nothing.

Good heavens! was this what marriage brought a man to? Mr. Cross had always thought of his friend as particularly fortunate. He was thinking of marrying himself, but now single blessedness looked particularly alluring.

"Never be such a donkey as I am, Cross," said Mr. Clyde, suddenly.

"How? What?" asked Mr. Cross, flushing guiltiv.

guiltily. "If you get married treat your wife like a reasonable human being."
"I don't understand, I am afraid, Clyde. Is it the result of your efforts in this line that I just witnessed? I am afraid I sha'n't go to my wife for money and let her dole it out to me, if that's what you mean."

"You will proceed on the old plan, dole it

"Don't you do it. It is enough to kill love,

"Don't you do it. It is enough to kill love, domestic peace, everything," burst forth Mr. Clyde, energetically.
"I can't see that your plan tends to clear the marital atmosphere," dryly. "My father gave mother money for her needs. My brother does the same, and this is the way of my friends generally."

"If women were not angels of patience and forbearance they would have revolted long ago."

"O, come now, isn't that a little strong?"
"Not half strong enough," blurted forth his

Mr. Cross pulled down his hat and shrugged his shoulders, irritably. Evidently his friend had mounted a hobby and was riding it to the death. "Most there, are we?" he asked as if he had forgotten the subject of conversation tion.

"I've tried it and I know," went on Mr. Clyde, unheeding the question. "It's what is killing so many women, this asking, begging, for money and having it doled out to them. People may call it nervousness, decline, prostration, overwork, what they will, but I know it is having to ask for money. I have had three days of it and I can feel the white hairs sprouting," and Mr. Clyde indulged in a hearty laugh at his own absurdity which cleared the mental atmosphere wonderfully.

"Oh, it is an experiment, is it?"

"Yes."
"Well, I am greatly relieved to know it. I feared you might be suffering from deterioration of the gray matter of the brain."
"But why is it worse for me than for Ethel,

"But why is it worse for me than for Ethei, that's what I want to know. I've tried the plan three days and if I knew it was to last I should be tempted to drown myself."

"I fancy Mrs. Clyde overdoes the matter."

"No she doesn't. I've made it a rule never to give her as much money as she asked for and the require a wird account of how she spent." to require a rigid account of how she spent it. She is as proud as you or I and she has made buttonholes for a coat manufacturer rather than ask me for all she needed. That "I should like it first rate, I know."

"Will you try it?"

"Yes, if you wish. Here is the pocket book," handing his wife the well-filled article to which he alluded. "Oh, I will take a five first."

"For what?" crisply inquired Mrs. Clyde.

"Well, I owe two dollars for cigars and I thought I might need the rest."

"Doubtless. I have not wasted five dollars in as many years, Robert. Here are three dollars. Try to make that do. It will pay for the marriage settlements and they are independent in money matters. This teaches them the lesson so hard for American women to learn that a dollar can only be spent once and that while figures won't lie they often deceive. "English women, for instance, save from one thing to buy another; they keep their accountabalanced; while here I have known my sister to spend a bill three times over in her mind before doing so in reality and then feel herself to spend a bill three times over in her mind before doing so in reality and then feel herself to have been cheated out of two thirds of her enjoyment. Women should be treated as equals." "Once our superiors, now our equal. Remember the toast at our dinner?"

"There is too much of that sort of thing Arthur. It clouds one's ideas of right. I shall go on with this experiment the rest of the week—if I live—and then submit a plan which I have thought out to Ethel."

"A sort of half and—balf system or a common."

"A sort of half-and-half system or a common pocket book into which you can both dip?"
"Something of that sort."
"Well, let me know how the plan succeeds. I am to be married in June."

"So soon?"

"Yes, and your talk has interested me won-derfully. But for that I am afraid I should have treated Mrs. Cross to a repetition of the marital blunders in money matters."

This conversation, the latter part of it, had progressed at the theater. Now the play began and the friends were perforce stient, but while the lover in the drama was assuring his lady of his undying affection Mr. Clyde was wordering if it storyed at the breest pocket. wondering if it stopped at the breast pocket, whether with all my earthly goods I thee endow ever meant that or was from the first ever meant that or was from the first intended as a shallow compliment to the inferior half of creation that they might the more easily wear the shackles matrimony forged for them. With the nineteenth century had come enlightenment. Women, no longer inferior, refused to cajole or be cajoled. They have stepped from the ranks of idiots, lunatics and children and declare their equality and they are ten times more fascinating than ever to the man of sense, thought Mr. Clyde as he felt his respect rising for the woman who had earned money rather than beg for it even of her earned money rather than beg for it even of her husband.

Mr. Clyde went through the week's experiment, asking for money when he needed it and getting along without when he could. He smoked few cigars, walked home from the office and resorted to various other makeshifts to save money but entered no complaints and Ethel began to feel at last as if he had failed to realize the full force of the situation.

HIS CHRISTMAS GIFT.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY GEORGE SMITH

Copyright, 1900, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

OHN Hamilton, New England born and bred, trusted representative of a great American business house in Manila, had decided to become a thief.

"An embezzler," the papers would call him, Hamilton thought grimly to himself; since his stealings would be reckoned not by dollars but by thousands. In his own mind, though, now it was made up, he did not quibble for words. He would be a thief.

The decision was no sudden one. The possibility of it had been before him, twice a year, ever since he had been in charge of the business of the house in the Philippines. Twice a year an amount of money had been sent him to pay out which would make an ordinary man rich. And he was only an ordinary man, who never would be rich, now, he reasoned, by work.

He would cut it all, name, friends, relatives all the life which had been his, go out of it all. and somewhere else begin another life, an easy happy one, in which there would be no more dull days of plodding work.

The getting away would be easy enough. He had thought it all over so many times that his plans almost made themselves. He told himself that there had been little enough else to think of in that lonesome, foreign country, so think of in that lonesome, foreign country, so that a man might almost be pardoned if his conscience did go back on him.

The money had come that day. He was to leave Manila at midnight, on a tramp steamer bound for Australia. The captain himself was to come ashore in a small boat for him. The Christmas holidays began that day. He had told his friends that he was to start early the next morning for a week's trip among the mountains. Long before it would be time for him to return and begin work again he would be safely out of the way. Even then it would be no one could know how long before the news of his flight could reach the firm at home.

His mother and sisters, back there in New England? Yes—what was the use, though? Had he not made up his mind that all that life

His mother and sisters, back there in New England? Yes—what was the use, though? Had he not made up his mind that all that life was to be left behind?

Just then Ramon came in. Ramon was Hamilton's Filipino servant, and on this occasion he wore a more than usually smiling face. He brought the week's washing, the fourteen suits of thin white cotton clothes which a white man in Manila requires to get through a week with. When the servant had put the clothes away, perhaps a little more carefully than usual, he turned to his master and smiling still more happily, said:

"Now, will the senor be so good as to give me my Christmas money?"

Do not think the man crazy, or even rude. That was only one of the long-established customs of Manila life, before the war. At Christmas time the butcher, the baker, the hostler, the cook, the scullion, the office boy, everybody who rendered any service, no matter how generously he might have been paid for it, asked his gift unblushingly, as a right, and got it. Hamilton had that day given to twenty men, even to one who had come to collect a bill but who had still asked for his own pour boire. Ramon was the last; and the best. He had really liked the fellow.

It was nearly evening, now, and almost everything was ready. He had put the papers ly liked the fellow.

It was nearly evening, now, and almost everything was ready. He had put the papers in his desk in order, that whoever came to take his place might have as little extra trouble in that way as possible. He had made out the pay roll for the office men, and given them their money. They should have their Christmas. The rest of the money, his Christmas, was in a hand bag ready for his journey.

"How much, Ramon?" Hamilton said.

"How much, Ramon?" Hamilton said.
"Oh, senor, that is not for me to say. The senor has always been more than generous."
Hamilton drew a package towards him on the desk, the balance of his own month's pay, from which he had paid bills that day and made gifts. He took five dollars from it, hesi-tated a moment, and then put another five with tated a moment, and then put another rive with the first.

"Oh, senor! Thanks, thanks, thanks! It is too much!" the servant cried, although his eyes were glistening with happiness. "This will help me so much towards buying the freedom of Anita?" select the marks marks.

"Towards what?" asked the man's master.

"Towards what?" asked the man's master.
"Who is Anita?"

"The most beautiful and the best girl in Manila" replied Ramon, his head thrown back with pride, for a moment, until he added, dropping his eyes again, "But she is a slave, and I love her, and will marry no other woman but her, free."

"Only," he went on, "it is so long to wait. She is so beautiful and so quick to work that her master asks forty dollars for her; and I had only fifteen dollars saved in two years, until today. It is slow to save the money I must be.

today. It is slow to save the money I must be, with the father and the mother to care for."
Forty dollars. There were fifteen dollars left in the package. What odds? There was a fortune in the bag. It was the last time. Hamilton shook out the money and pushed it towards the men.

"Oh, hush up," he said to the native's eager thanks. "That's all right. Go and find Anita, and tell her. Good night. Yes. A merry Christmas."

"A Merry Christmas." Who would be there to wish him that tomorrow? No matter. He himself would wish it to himself.

Hamilton spent the evening in cleaning up his room, burning letters, and packing another bag with clothes. Even then the time dragged. Eleven o'clock came. Another hour to be got through. He took his hat and went out on to the street, to have one last look at the city. In Manila, in those days, on Christmas eve everybody was in the streets. A few, a very few, went into the churches to pray; more strolled in to hear the music and see the lights about the hambino before the alter and then about the bambino before the altar, and then shout the bambino before the altar, and then strolled out again.

Hamilton found himself in the cathedral, wandering up the aisle. Now and then he bowed to some one whom he knew, out like himself to pass the time away. Inside a railed-off space before the chancel there knelt upon the stone floor a little group of those who had come to worship. Among them he saw Ramon kneeling beside a beautiful Visayan woman. While Hamilton stood watching them the man and woman rose and came from behind the railing, hand in hand, into the aisle.

When Ramon saw who stood there before them he gave a glad cry, and his eyes shone.

"Anita!" he said. "The gracious senor!" and added some words in the woman's native tongue.

At which Anita looked up, shyly at first, at the great Americano. But a moment later, her eyes glistening with tears of joy, she said softly, "The senor is more good than we can ever say to him, but we have been tonight to thank God for his gift, and to ask the blessed Christ child to give to the senor this Christmas all the reward which the goodness of his heart deserves."

deserves."
Then they had bowed low before him and gone out, still hand in hand.
Hamilton followed. "To give him all the reward the goodness of his heart deserved." It seemed as if the priests in the chancel chanted the words; and when he had gone out into the open air he still heard them.
He stopped upon a corner, thinking. Men and women jostled him, careless of their steps in the rush of the holiday celebration. A coolie passed. Hamilton hailed him and gave him a coin.
"Go down to the water front," he said, "and

"Go down to the water front," he said, "and

"Go down to the water front," he said, "and find a man waiting in a small boat at the long pier. Tell him the American senor sent word he would not come, and that the steamer was not to wait."

Then he went home, while the bells in the cathedral tower were filling all the city with their message that the hour of midnight had passed, and that the dawn of Christmas Day had come.

TAGS FOR FOOD FISHES.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT.

HERE is something very picturesque about the notion of fastening metal tags to marine fishes, and then letting them loose in the ocean, with the idea of identifying them as individuals in case they hap-pen to be caught at a future time.

This is what the United States Fish Commis-with the idea of identifying them as individuals in case they happen to be caught at a future time.

This is what the United States Fish Commission is doing just now with cod, fifteen hundred of which have been duly tagged and released this year. No two tags are alike, the markings on them being stamped in a series of letters and numbers, record of which is kept in a book in such a manner that, if a tagged codfish turns up, a moment's reference to the memoranda will furnish the history of that particular specimen, with date of liberation, weight, and so forth. For example, a cod wearing a tag with the raised inscription "S 10" has a complete identification card, so that she cannot be mixed up with any other fish entered in the Commission's ledger.

Only "brood fish"—i. e., spawning females—are tagged. They are bought from fishermen, stripped of their eggs at Wood's Hole, Mass., and liberated in the waters of Vineyard Sound, after having the tags attached to them. The tag is a small piece of copper, securely fastened by a wire passed through a fin near its junction with the body. It does not matter much which fin is chosen, though a back or tail fin is best. The tag is very light and its attachment in the manner described does no harm whatever to the animal. During the last few months the Fish Commission has distributed a circular all along the coast of New England, requesting that whenever a cod with a tag comes into the hands of a fisherman or other person, he shall remove the piece of metal and send it to the Commission station at Wood's Hole, together with a brief statement as to the date on which the fish was caught, where it was captured, its weight before being dressed, its length and the condition of its roe.

The object of the tagging is to ascertain the rate at which a cod grows, the frequency of its spawning, and the extent of its travels in the ocean. Knowledge of this kind has an obvious bearing upon fishcultural problems, and there is every reason to believe that the future of the cod fishery off t

Some years ago a similar experiment was made at the Fish Commission station on the Clackamas River, which is a tributary of the Columbia; but, instead of tagging the young fishes, the soft dorsal fins were shaved off of them with a razor before they were released. When they came back to spawn, three years later, they averaged twenty pounds in weight. From this experiment one or two very interesting conclusions were drawn. If all of the artificially hatched fry had survived and been

From this experiment one or two very interesting conclusions were drawn. If all of the artificially hatched fry had survived and been captured, it is obvious that 1000 of them would have contributed 20,000 pounds of food fish for market. As a matter of fact, only one out of ten of them returned and was taken, the result being 2000 pounds of fish for every 1000 young ones liberated. At five cents a pound—the regular price paid by the canners to the fishermen—each 1000 fry hatched by the Fish Commission represented just about $100.

Commission represented just about $100.

These figures are instructive. At the present time the Fish Commission hatches annually in glass jars, with the help of running water, seventy-five million salmon, which it plants in the rivers of the Pacific coast. If, as is believed to be the case, every 1000 of these finny infants represents a ton of salmon three years later, it is obvious that the total result per annum is 75,000 tons—that is to say, 150,000,000 pounds, which, at five cents a pound, fetch $7,500,000 in the market, incidentally supplying the United States and many countries abroad with an article of diet most highly valued.

A number of years ago an experiment was made with the tagging of brood salmon in the Penobscot, in order to find out whether they returned to the sea after spawning. The salmon of the Pacific coast, having ascended the rivers to lay their eggs, never go back to the rivers to lay their eggs, never go back to the ocean, but die in the headwaters of the streams. It is not so, however, with the Maine salmon, which, as was proved by the tags attached to them, come back to the river tags attached to them, come back to the river every second year to breed.

The fact has been established that salmon, though they spend most of their lives at sea, never wander very far from the mouths of the rivers in which they were originally hatched. A Sacramento salmon, for example, always remains a Sacramento salmon from birth to death, feeding in the neighborhood of the mouth of that stream and ascending its current when the spawning period arrives. It is the same way with the shad, which, like the salmon, is a marine species, only running up the rivers to perform the function of reproduction.

Midwinter Sports in the Northwest.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT.

ERHAPS there is no section in the United States of America more favorable for midwinter sports than in the vicinity of St. Paul and Min-on St. Paul and Minneapolis.

One of the most novel experiences to the New Englander is ice-boating. During the average winter segan there are ing the average winter season there are days and days of favorable weather suitable for this fascinating and fashionable sport when it is clear and when it is clear and crisp and exhilarat-ing. If the weather is too keenly cold the pleasure is not as-sured, because the great speed intensifies the cold which is exposing and uncom-fortable.

It was a merry party that went out to Lake Minnetonka one day for an ice-boating excursion. After an appetizing dinner at the club-house which an appetizing dinner at the club-house which is delightfully situated on the shore of the lake and open all the year, the party, composed of gentlemen and ladies heavily clothed proceeded to the white-winged fleet, which the skippers held in readiness. The white sails gleaming in the sunlight, and the red velvet cushions in the shallow decks and the skippers in their bright parti-colored suits, tightfitting and warm, all made a very picturesque scene.

One looks and feels somewhat like an Arctiewrlorer when starting to embark on the ice-and warm, all made a very picturesque scene.

One looks and feels somewhat like an Arctic explorer when starting to embark on the iceboats. Wraps of the heaviest and warmest kind are worn and extras are carried along. To be warm is an important condition, and anything contributing to it is permissible; the more one presents the appearance of an Esquimau the better.

In construction, the ice-boat differs essentially from the sail-boat or any craft that skims over the lake during warm weather, or even cold weather. There are two long hard pine beams that cross each other at right angles; the cross beam rests on two short steel runners or skates, and swings easily from the main beam, so that the boat is readily controlled. On the boom which runs parallel with the long main beam are the sails, and at the rear end of the main beam is the deck which is very shallow, finished in cherry wood and lined with red velvet cushions. The deck accommodates only four persons, including the skipper.

Just in the rear of the deck is the rudder, which together with the sails is controlled by the skipper. Short steel runners are also on the front and rear ends of the main or body

Passengers cannot sit erect a sin a sail-boat, but must recline, or half lie down, and hold fast to an iron bar which passes through the center of the deck.

Once started, the speed is something almost appalling, distancing in a few moments all other modes of conveyance.

The sensation of rapidity resembles the toboggan slide more than anything else; but includes an experience not found on the toboggan; and that is the turn or whirl of the ice-boat which is done at the same rate of speed. This turn is something tremendous in force, ice-boat which is done at the same rate of speed. This turn is something tremendous in force, and if one did not hold fast to the iron bar with all one's strength, one would be hurled off without any ceremony and left spinning round and round on the ice until one's head feels like bursting from dizziness; and bruises and scratches on the face are included. Yet this rough treatment seldom, if ever, causes any fatal results. fatal results.

These turns occur when the boat must change its course or run ashore, for ice-boats run a straight course as far as they can.

New comers are usually notified of the coming turn so they may get their grip on the iron bar, which is covered with red velvet.

The frame that holds it when in operation is constructed on the lazytong sprinciple, and when extended takes the form of a ring-like table with a multitude of legs and a network bag for a top. The lazytongs are quickly locked when in this position, so as to prevent them from collapsing and the net offers a safe landing for anybody who may drop into it.

For additional safety hand-grips of rope are provided on the external periphery of the apparatus, so that firemen and bystanders may take hold and by pulling outward give extra stability to the affair. Beneath the net is attached a large air-cushion in the shape of a ball, to contribute yet more resistance to weight suddenly brought upon the net. When the latter is no longer wanted for the time being, it is collapsed into a compact cylindrical bundle the terrature or account of the safety and the saf bar, which is covered with red velvet.

During a first spin or cruise a sense of fear is developed by the swift, sharp turn, and there is a longing for the shore, while the sharp cutting of the air caused by the great speed is not always comfortable to the new-comer. Woolen or knitted mask hoods are often worn to temper the sharp air. As the ice is sometimes hubbly one gets quite a shaking, and a whirling, rushing shaking, unlike any other.

CURLING.

By repeated spins one becomes accustomed to the speed of "those awful whirls," as all newthe speed of "those awful whiris," as all new-comers call them; and it is not long before one becomes fascinated and is not quite satisfied until "twenty miles in twenty minutes" have been run. Racing speed is often recorded at a mile a minute, and at a distance the boats in full sail look not unlike gigantic sea gulls skimming over the frozen surface of the lake.

Some of the boats in the fleet on Lake Minnetonka were brought from the Hudson River, where ice-boating has been in vogue for a long time. They are made very strong and of the best materials, and frequently cost five hun-dred dollars. That it requires more nerve and training to manage an ice boat than a sailboat is apparent to any observer.

The question is often asked, "Do serious accidents ever happen?" They are the exception, and then usually through one's own careless-ness. If a rudder breaks, which seldom, if ever, every detail.

A winter sport enjoyed particularly by the Scottish people of Minneapolis is "Curling" on the ice. This game has been known in Scotland for three hundred years and more. It is thought to have originated by men and boys hurling stones over the ice, and was at first called "channel stane," or stone.

The Highlanders and Lowlanders played the game with great energy and interest. The game includes two contending parties, usually four on a side, who hurl and slide large smooth stones of a circular form from one mark to another called the tee. At either end of a space of ice one hundred and thirty-five feet long, are circles, in the center of which is the tee.

To hurl a curling-stone along the ice to the tee, putting it into position, or in driving competing curlers out of position is the skill demanded in the game.

Pneumatic Tube Mail Delivery.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

THIS age of scientific marvels and mechanical triumphs nothing sur-prises us, so accustomed have we become to won-derful in yen tions. derful inventions. Uncle Sam, in common with the other nations, has taken advantage of some of the most useful products of 19th century genius to help out his vast army of postal clerks. In the carrying and distribution of the mails man has accom-plished wonders in annihilating time and distance. Swift express trains going at the rate of even ninety miles an hour have taken the place of stage coaches and pony expresses even in the memory of the present generation. Fleet mail steamers, fit-

Fleet mail steamers, fitted with rooms for sorting and distributing foreign mail have made the journey from continent to continent seem a mere trifle. Specially fitted electric cars have aided materially in collecting and distributing mail throughout the cities. But it is a still newer invention that this paper is to describe.

Until recently no particular provision has been made for rapidly forwarding mail to various parts of a city after the bag had been thrown from the train, or for collecting it rapidly. Wagons have been displaced to some extent by the electric mail cars, but an enormous saving of time will be effected when the system of pneumatic tubes becomes more fully develof pneumatic tubes becomes more fully developed. This system of distributing mail is already in use in a number of the larger cities both in America and Europe, though here the pneumatic tube is still somewhat of a novelty. In New York the greater part of the mail between Manhattan Island and Brooklyn is now the provided the state of the state of the same tubes which pass sent through two large mail tubes which pass over Brooklyn Bridge. The Grand Central Station is connected with the central postoffice three and a half miles away, and the carriers containing mail make this distance in about two minutes.

Boston has recently laid a pneumatic tube between the postoffice and the Union Station, and still further extension of the system is contemplated. Philadelphia has its business district connected with its railroad stations by tubes, and a set of tubes is contemplated, radiating from the business portion of the city in all directions to do an express business. Chiego is experimenting with pneumatic tubes, while in Europe, London, Vienna, Berlin and Paris are using them to their entire satisfaction. two minutes.

In London and Berlin the tubes are arranged all radiating from the central station to the sub-stations. There are thirty-four miles of tube in London, and forty-two stations. Sixty thousand letters are sent daily through these tubes. Paris has twenty stations connected by a belt line around the city, which is also connected with the central postoffice. Berlin has twenty-eight miles of tube and thirty-eight stations. The system there, as in London, is double-tracked, so that a carrier can be emptied at any way-station and sent back at once to the central station; while in Paris all the carriers travel in the same direction and each one must make a circuit of the city before returning to its starting point.

A pneumatic tube may be compared to a long gun-barrel, or an immense bean-blower, bored to great accuracy, so that the interior presents an unbroken surface. It is buried in the ground, with manholes and subterranean chambers at convenient points, where tests of air pressure may be made, obstructions removed, repairs made and the tubes cleaned and lubricated.

repairs made and the tubes cleaned and lubricated.

While European cities have been using these tubes for nearly fifty years, those that have recently been installed in America are far superior. The older London tubes were three inches in diameter, lined with lead, while the carriers were of felt and had a capacity of about thirty-five letters. The latest ones to be installed in New York are much larger, being eight inches in diameter and with carriers large enough to contain six hundred letters. The motive power, of course, is compressed air. Our initial cut shows one of the drawings. At the sending stations the letters are packed into the carriers, which somewhat resemble the cash carriers used in some of our larger stores, the cylinder is loaded into the tube as a cartridge is loaded into the breech of a rifle, a lever is pulled and away the carrier shoots to lever is pulled and away the carrier shoots to its destination. A piston travels ahead, draw-ing a train of carriers by suction, while the compressed air in the rear helps push them

Electrical automatic machines at the various Electrical automatic machines at the various way-stations catch the carriers belonging to them and deposit them gently on a table, letting the others pass by. A regular automatic block-signal system keeps the carriers the proper distance apart and thus prevents rearend collisions in the tubes. As the carriers travel through the tubes at the rate of about forty miles an hour, it can readily be seen that this is a very necessary precaution.

Some idea of the saving in time—which is money to the commercial world—may be learned from the fact that in New York alone 126,350 letters and 20,000 papers daily travel through this tube. Probably an hour is saved in the delivery of each. This alone means a great deal, but when we reflect that the saving of this hour enables letters to catch an earlier train for the West, which in turn may mean eatching a mail a day earlier further on in the trip, or a foreign steamer on the Pacific coast a week earlier than would otherwise be possible.

the advantage gained by this system can hardly be estimated.

The possibilities of the pneumatic tube are by no means exhausted yet. A little specula-tion on the subject may not be idle. Perhaps our cities will some day have an express sys-tem, with tubes on a large scale, radiating from the business center of a large city to the from the business center of a large city to the suburbs, so that our 20th century shoppers may do their buying pneumatically. The business man of the future may be connected with his home in the country and have a hot lunch shot in town at noon, right from his own kitchen. Perhaps even people may travel through these tubes in time. A line for carrying mail may be built across the ocean; then perhaps a passenger line may be built. Impossible? Perhaps. But one hundred years ago people would have told you it would be impossible even to talk between New York and Chicago, to send a message around the world Chicago, to send a message around the world in less than a minute, to cross the ocean or the continent in five days. Who shall say, in this age of wonders, that anything is impossible?

Gems Used In The Arts.

IAMONDS, as they come from the mines, are separated roughly into three grades. A quantity of them will be thrown upon a table and divided into three heaps. The first pile will consist of stones which, by reason of their transparency and shape, are suitable for cut-ting as gems. The are suitable for cutting as gems. The second heap will embrace those which are more available for drills and bits, and the third will represent inferior material that can be utilized only as an abrasive, for the cutting and polishing of diamonds and other precious stones. Gems of the second class are employed to a small extent as bearings for instruments of precision.

Chiefly from Brazil comes a kind of diamond, somewhat impure, which is known as "carbonado." It is black and was used a few years ago much more than it is now for drills and bits, being extremely hard, and yet not at all brittle. It has sometimes been found in pieces as big as one's fist. To-day, however, the inferior gem diamonds are used in preference to it. these latter being actually worth more in ferior gem diamonds are used in preference to it, these latter being actually worth more in the arts than as precious stones. A diamond drill may cost a good deal of money, but it lasts a long while and does much valuable work before it wears out.

Rubies and sapphires, which are forms of corundum, are both of exactly the same hardness, coming next after the diamond in that respect. Stones of these kinds not utilized as gems are employed as water-jewels and as bear-corundum, are both of exactly the same hardness, coming next after the diamond in that respect. Stones of these kinds not utilized as gems are employed as water-jewels and as bearings for instruments. They are also used as abrasives, especially for cutting other precious stones. Emery is an impure corundum, and its value and wide use as an abrasive is sufficiently well known.

Emerald, which is a green variety of beryl, seems to have no usefulness in the arts. Garnet is employed for watch-jewels and as an abrasive. Tourmaline, the most remarkable crystals of which come from Maine, is extensively used for optical purposes, to polarize light, possessing as it does this peculiar and very interesting property.

Nine years ago a Pittsburg chemist named Acheson discovered by an accident the substance now known as "carborundum." He was trying to make artificial diamonds in an electric furnace, out of a mixture of carbon and clay. Some exquisite crystals resulted, and he thought for a while that he had succeeded. It soon appeared, however, that the crystals were an entirely new compound of carbon and silicon, harder than the ruby and only less hard than the diamond. Their usefulness as an abrasive seemed obvious, and apparently there was a great fortune in the manufacture of them for this purpose. Unluckily, their value in this way has not been found to be as great as was supposed, because the crystals are brittle and of unequal hardness. It has been ascertained, however, that further treatment in the electric furnace will convert the carborundum into graphite of a very high grade, for which there is a never-failing demand. It was imagined for awhile that the crystals might be marketable as artificial gems, inasmuch as they are very pretty, but this expectation has not been realized.

The remedies are especially adapted for those who suffer from weak lungs, coughs, sore throat, catarrh, consumption and other pulmonary troubles.

But they are also of wonderful efficacy to the building up of weak systems, in purifying the blood, making flesh, and restoring to weak, sallow people rich and healthy constitutions.

The many ailments of women and delicate children are speedily relieved.

The basis of the entire system is a flesh-building, nerve and tissue renewing food.

Every invalid and sick person needs strength. This food gives it.

This food gives it.

Many people get the complete system for the sake of the Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil, which they themselves need, and give away the other three preparations to their friends.

The second article is a Tonic. It is good for weak, thin, dyspeptic, nervous people. For those who have no appetite, who need bracing up.

Thousands take only the Emulsion and the Tonic. The third preparation is a medicinal healing Ozojell, in a patent nasal tube. It cures catarrh. It heals all irritation of the nose, throat and mucous membranes. It gives immediate relief. It is also a dainty application for sore lips and rough skin.

WE GIVE THIS WATCH FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. T has come to be an understood fact that the severe tailor-made gowns, consisting of perfectly plain coat and skirt, are now worn largely by the "out door" woman who goes in for all sorts of sports, and have lost their high place in the affectheir high place in the affections of general womankind.
Certain it is the large share of tailor gowns turned out in New York are Frenchified by nameless little touches which relieve them from severity and yet they are severity, and yet they are strictly "tailored". For in-stance, a search through any of the best known houses on the Avenue shows the growing tendency to fanciful skirts and decorative bodices. One of the newest skirts of the season has a tight-fitting upper-body, with a box-pleated flounce attached at the knee, the uping the flounce in squares. A Very few sleeves are plain. The bell shape is Very few sleeves are plain. The bell shape is much in vogue, sometimes reaching to the hand and sometimes short enough to display a small undersleeve of whatever material may correspond with the gown in question. The sleeves of jackets and coats, especially, are made up in this style. The Bishop sleeve with loose cuff is also displayed on coats and wraps. In fact the only radical change in the winter coat from that of last season is the sleeve; especially is this so if one chooses the short coat. The half, three-quarter, and full-length box coat reigns supreme, though for continuous wear it is not to be recommended as one wearies of so pronounced a style, and unless one has just the right shade of jauntiness about their carriage the effect is extremely disappointing.

At the furriers are superb wraps made in the box style, those made up of broad tails being most effective, combined as to collar and revers with mink, ermine, or any of the various handsome furs we now have.

The newest cry in the shirt waist world is the bolero made of the same material and fin-ished with stitched bands of like or contrast-ing color. I saw such a stunning one of scarlet flannel, the soft waist surmounted by a natty little bolero of the same material, bordered on bell sleeves and is collarless. Separate boleros of black velvet made very Separate boleros of black velvet made very short and hollowed out at the throat considerably to display the dainty under waist, are smart adjuncts to a dressy toilet, embroidered as they are with the richest and most gorgeous of colors, as well as the lavish use of gold.

Velvet hats are by far the most favored thing in millinery. An especially smart toque has a soft crown of deep rosy-violet velvet, around which is effectively draped velvet of a lighter shade of pink. This is also massed softly in front and held in place by a jeweled buckle. When worn on the head it has the effect of a Napoleon hat, than which no other shape is Napoleon hat, than which no other shape is more sought af-

The Aiglon collar is the newest. It is high and straight and fastens with one button to fastens with one button to the left of the Light-weight stuffs for indoor wear are made

Light-weight stuffs for indoor wear are made up in a variety of fanciful ways, the skirts being tucked, shirred or plaited. A gauze skirt intended for a party frock has bias tucks running from the side to the fullness, and was let out or held in place by a buckle.

One of the daintiest waists it has been my good fortune to see this season has its entire body made of accordion plaited chiffon across which are set three-inch bands of heavy gold embroidery, one in the center and one on either side, the edges attached at intervals by means of small turquoise ornaments. The sleeves have a body of the chiffon across which are set bands of the gold the second one drawing the bands of the gold the second one drawing the chiffon snugly at the elbow, while the third forms a cuff to which the soft, full sleeve is at-

Another pretty bodice has a body of plaited chiffon in pale rose. Over this is worn a bolero of white taffeta embroidered in gold thread and white silk. After being embroidered the silk was cut away, thus showing the color through. A line of gold was also around the edge of the sleeve and top of the collar, while a narrow belt of gold fastened with a gold and blue enamel buckle gave the finishing touch.

For the woman to whom furs are impossible, a stylish neck piece is shown in the form of a thick, deep ruche of taffeta, Liberty silk, or thick, deep ruche of taffeta, Liberty silk, or chiffon, finished with a dozen or more long loops on either side of black chenille. These ends are allowed to fall straight and are very effective and becoming. Very often these chenille ends are tipped with the odd little gold points now considered so modish. Boas of coope feethers are sain in verye and ere gold points now considered so modish. Boas of coque feathers are again in vogue and are sometimes combined with fur, with to my mind, a somewhat unsatisfactory effect. A feature of new neck wear is the finishing of the folded silk ties with gold points, or oddly enameled ornaments, made light enough not to cause the ends to drag. A chic little neck fixing consists of an inch wide band of gauzy gold braid, brought around the neck, and crossed midway to the bust, the two short ends finished with gold points studded with turquoise.

Narrow belts of gold with all sorts of fancy buckles are the latest cry and add a dainty finish to many a plain toilette.

A smart little stock is made of Persian silk with a plain border of the predominating color in the Persian. The top of the collar is edged with three rows of narrow gold braid which is used also inside the band on the bow.

Some of the new turbans appear almost square in their flatness. One of violet velvet shot with gold threads has gold threads has the velvet laid in precise folds in precise folds straight a bout the turned-up turban brim which is to be set low over the forehead. The crown is lower than the brim and is laid flat and smooth, intensifying the square shape. A square shape. A brow quill speckled with purple and gold sweeps about the turban along the top of the brim starting from a gold buckle at the left side rather toward the back. Very picreturesque are the flat hats of black velvet, some-what after the style of the poke, and trimmed simply with choux of the velvet arranged flatly across the front. Such a dainty one I saw hav-ing a cluster of pale pink roses nestled in at the

One can get up such wonderfully pretty collars and undersleeves with so little trouble, and as one set can be made to do service with various waists and coats, their first expense is not to be considered. A pair of undersleeves of white Liberty silk is barred across with narrow black velvet, each band lined through the center with a small gold cord. The loose cuff has a border of blue panne velvet beside the black velvet and gold cord, and is closed with dainty turquoise buttons. The stock shows a combination of the colors. turquoise buttons. "Oh! Dear I'm so Tired."

The ordinary every-day life of most of our women is a ceaseless treadmill of work.

How much harder the daily tasks become when some derangement of the female organs makes every movement painful and keeps the nervous system all unstrung!

One day she is wretched and utterly miserable; in a day or two she is better and laughs at her fears, thinking there is nothing much the matter after all; but before night the deadly backache reappears, the limbs tremble, the lips twitch -it seems as though all the imps of Satan were clutching her vitals; she goes to pieces and is flat on her back.

No woman ought to arrive at this terrible state of misery, because these symptoms are a sure forerunner of womb troubles. She must remember that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is almost an infallible cure for all female ills, such as irregularity of periods, which cause weak stomach, sick headache, etc., displacements and inflammation of the womb, or any of the multitudes of illnesses which beset the female organism.

Mrs. Gooden wrote to Mrs. Pinkham when she was in great trouble. Her letter tells the result.

"Dear Mrs. Pinkham:—I am very grateful to you for your kindness and the interest you have taken in me, and truly believe that your medicines and advice are worth more to a woman than all the doctors in the world. My troubles began with inflammation and hemorrhages from the kidneys, then inflammation, congestion and falling of the womb, and inflammation of the ovaries. I underwent local treatment every day for some time; then, after nearly two months, the doctor gave me permission to go back to work. I went back, but in less than a week was compelled to give up and go to bed. On breaking down the second time, I decided to let doctors and medicines alone and try your remedies. Before the first bottle was gone I felt the effects of it. Three bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and a package of Sanative Wash did me more good than all the doctors' treatments and medicine. I have gained twelve pounds during the am better in every way. Thanking you for your

the exhibition of Chicago was reached in general design or appearance by the cramped and crowded Parisian fair.

Next year, however, in our own country, is to be an exhibition which it is boldly claimed by its projectors will be the most satisfying world's exhibition ever given, and in beauty will outclass any of its more pretentious rivals, while it will completely eclipse all the attempts at the smaller exhibitions which have been given in the last few years, which were more than national in character, but not on the level of the large international fairs.

Ever since the great Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia, the people who have seen these fairs have been impressed with the idea that the vastness of the international exhibithat the vastness of the international exhibition made it impossible of complete survey by the ordinary person with the limited means and limited time at his disposal; while, on the contrary, the smaller exhibitions were hardly as much as could be expected. The Buffalo people, with their characteristic enterprise, decided some years ago upon the establishment of the Pan-American Exposition of 1901, and are now making every preparation for an exhibition which shall be so comprehensive in character as to give all that is desirable of the great fair, and to take away any criticism which attaches itself to the smaller one. They have, in fact, selected the happy medium so far as size is concerned; but have gone into a scheme of architecture, coloring and art which it is believed will easily eclipse any attempt, great or small, which has ever been made in this line. Where Chicago was one vast white city, the Buffalo exhibition is to be a marvel of bright colors and intense effects which has never been attempted by any similar exhibition.

The Pan-American Exposition is to be opened never been attempted.

The Pan-American Exposition is to be opened at Buffalo, May 1st, 1901, and will continue until the first day of November of the same year. It was called Pan-American from the original to make it a distinctively American intention to make it a distinctively American exposition, embracing both the north and south continents, and its object was to bring into closer relations, commercially and socially, all the governments on the western hemisphere; but its scope has gradually increased until it but its scope has gradually increased until it promises to be one of the most complete and satisfying exhibitions ever given. The managers have wisely decided upon a great exhibition, which might not be called vast, and which, great as it will be, could be thoroughly seen in the time which is usually devoted to such objects. Congress appropriated $500,000 in the year 1899, and since then the subscriptions have been largely increased by other means. Official acceptances have been received, in answer to the invitations, by almost every country of the two hemispheres, as well as those on the continent. For a long time there was no great public interest in the projected fair; but in the last few months every indication has shown that intense interest and competition are aroused, and everything shows that it will be a most successful enterprise. As usual, the entertainment is entirely prise. As usual, the entertainment is entirely run by a stock company, which has worked heartily for its success, and which has been very wise in the choice of its officers and members of its Publicity Bureau.

No city in the United States is better adapted for this great exhibition than Buffelo a city of

for this great exhibition than Buffalo, a city of wide streets beautifully laid out, of handsome residences and superior hotel accommodations. It is of itself well worth a visit from any person, and it will but add to the attractions of the fair itself. It has beautiful suburbs, fine parks and is parks, and is a typical resi-dential city of the highest class. Only a mile away are Ni-agara Falls, which are easily reach-ed by several railroads and electric lines; and on the other side are and on the other side are the beautiful excursions which will be arranged to take in one of the Great Lakes, the St.

Lawren ce, Thousand Islands, and the quaint, half ancient cities of Quebec and Montreal. Altogether no location could have been more satisfactory than that selected.

The principal buildings of the exposition surround a broad, beautiful court, in the form of an inverted letter T. The transverse section of this court is known as the Esplanade, running east and west to a distance of 1700 feet between the two extremes. The Court of Fountains, which lies north of the transverse section, is 500 feet wide, and 2000 feet from north to south. The grounds will be entered through the beautiful entrance on Lincoln Parkway. There will be a large number of buildings devoted to the exhibition proper, many of them under Government control. The Government group alone will consist of three buildings, as it is the intention of the administration to make this one of the greatest features of the whole exhibition, and larger than anything that has been attempted, for the benefit of our kindred nations in this hemisphere. There will be the usual number of larger buildings for horticulture, graphic arts, forestry, mines, etc.; and a more thorough detail of these buildings and what may be seen in them will be given in a what may be seen in them will be given in a future number of COMFORT.

The general style of architecture of the exposition is a free treatment of the Spanish Renaissance, which has been chosen as a compliment to the many Latin-American countries whose interest was sought and received in this enterprise. The plan promises an exposition splendid and unique in architectural aspect. The architects have found their inspiration chiefly in the Latin-American cities, and the work of ornamentation is being carried out elaborately in every detail. Colonnades and arcades, suggesting coolness and comfort; elevated pavilions, balconies, loggias, domes, lanterns, towers, minarets, commanding broad views of the grounds; fancy flag standards and finials of varied design will be extensively used in the ornamentation of the main structures. The finer details will be worked out by the liberal use of statuary, medallions, arabesques and other work in relief. About 125 grand original sculptured groups are under contract, a far greater display than seen at any other American exposition, the work engaging

In planning the exposition, the management early decided upon giving electricity special homage and position. The progress of this science has been so marvelously rapid in the past few years, and so many people believe that it is the coming light, heat, and power of the world, that every attention has been given to a most complete exhibition of its many uses. No city in the world is as well situated as Buffalo for a complete exhibition of this great branch

The nearness of Niagara Falls, which have been harnessed to man's mechanwhich have been harnessed to man's mechan-ism, and where now are the greatest electric power plants known in this class of engineer-ing, give a power which could not be contem-plated by any other city in the world; for in no other place could so large a volume of power be available except at a cost that would make it practically impossible. These famous falls, by the magic of electronic science, which is not necessary and into day, and give to every ripple of the pools, and spurtevery spurt-ing fountain, a fantastic brilliance that will make the courts of the exposition a fairyland of unprecedented loveliness. To describe one building which we have illustrated, the Electric Tower, it is three hundred and seventy-five feet high, and upon it are to be displayed electrical phenomena to an extent hitherto unattempted. This stands between the Court of Fountains and the Plaza. The main body of the tower, which is shown in our illustration, is eighty feet square and two hundred feet high. The crown is in three parts, of diminishing proportions. The first of these is a loggia, with the wall surfaces brilliantly colored, and richly ornamented in all details. At the base of the tower, on the east and west sides, are two colonnades, seventy-five feet high, which sweep to the southward and and west sides, are two colonnades, seventy-five leet high, which sweep to the southward and DEAFNESS ROWAN, Milwaukee, Wis.

form a semicircular space, opening toward the Court of Fountains. Elevators will carry the visitors to the many floors. At a height of seventy-five feet is to be a restaurant, with a roof garden; the floors on other heights will be used for reception rooms and other purposes, and from the various floors, pavilions and cupolas, may be seen the most beautiful views of the city, Lake Erie, Niagara River and the Canadian shore. The whole exterior of the tower is to be richly ornamented with plastic designs and sculpture. It is intended as the designs and sculpture. It is intended as the centerpiece of the exposition. The great panels on the four sides will be of openwork, so

From the Plaza, of which we give a view, is the entrance to the Midway and the Propylea. In the Midway will be twenty acres devoted to novel entertainments, which will cqual or surpass anything of the kind ever seen. In this place will be the largest Indian settlement, representing the most tribes, and giving the best idea of Indian life ever gathered.

The Propyleae is properly the railway station, but is not, as some fancy, the transportation exhibit, which is in another building. It is designed as a great railway station on the north end of the grounds.

In the Stadium, near to it, will be held athletic carnivals during the exposition on a scale far more elaborate and comprehensive than has ever been undertaken in America. The high position which Americans have taken in recent far more elaborate and comprehensive than has ever been undertaken in America. The high position which Americans have taken in recent years in athletic sports, and their many victories in international contests abroad, especially in the recent world's fairs, have created such emulation in foreign countries that contests are being arranged, which will far surpass any of the great international contests with which we are familiar. The exterior dimensions are nearly equal to those of the famous Colosseum at Rome. The arena will contain a quarter mile track and ample space for athletic contests of all kinds, and there will be a seating capacity of ten thousand.

The grounds chosen for the exhibition are in Delaware Park, which lies in the northern part of Buffalo, well within the city limits. The entire park contains three hundred and fifty acres, and within the park lands is a small lake, which is described as one of the most beautiful interior lakes in the country. It will undoubtedly prove a great drawing card for the first year of the new century. When it is realized that the greatest patronage which is received in European travel and European cities is from the Americans, and that we as a country spend money freely and even lavishly, and that the greater part of the patronage of the far away Paris Exposition was American, the possibilities for the coming Buffalo exposition are easily realized. With the great prosperity which is prevailing all over the United States, the exposition is certain of a great home patronage. To this will be added the natural curiosity and interest of foreigners, especially Europeans, on account of the rapid strides which the United States has taken to the front in world affairs in the last two or three years. Having everything in this country for use and luxury, more natural seenery than in any other part of the world, and everything, in fact, except ruins, which come alone with time, it is a surprising thing how few foreigners, comparatively, have taken the trouble to visit the Unit visit America and see for themselves its wonders; so that with the Pan-American Exposition, the inter-national yacht race, and the general prosperity of the country, it seems safe to predict that the attendance on the Buffalo Exposition will be not only one of the largest, but of more cosmopolitan character than any previous exposition in America, if not in the whole world.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMPORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank

for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatly, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in eater to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-wead, several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is ometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

ANY letters like the following come to me every month and they make my work easier and my life pleasanter:

"I have read with interest all your articles in COMFORT and I want to tell you that of all the limes of the hand so plainly and satisfactorily as you do." She also states that she has read the books of Cheiro, Louise Colton, St. Germain and Dix, and wants I should recommend others, more exhaustive. Probably the most exhaustive is Heron-Allen's "Manual of Cheirosophy," which can be had of Brentano, N. Y., or ordered through any book store. It is an English book and the author has used the best of systems of D'Arpentigny and Adrien Desbarollee as well as others less well known among the established authorities. Eliza Henderson of Cambridge, Mass., has issued a text book also but I do not consider it as good as Cheiro's. The last named is so arranged that it is easier to learn; but the author is quite independent of the older authorities and so his conclusions are sometimes confusing to one who has studied others. clusions are sometimes confusing to one who has studied others.

For instance, "Agnes" asked some questions regarding the marriage line under the little finger awhile ago: I answered, giving Cheiro's opinion, which confused her not a little. I do not pretend to decide between eminent authorities, I only give their conclusions. I will answer a question for Agnes, in the hope that it will help other students, of whom I find I have many in COMFORT.

many in COMFORT.

A line starting from the head-line and following along the fate-line, either crossing it or not, and keeping close to Saturn or Jupiter, or between them, would probably mean a marriage late in life, or clse a very close friendship. It would surely mean marriage if corroborated by a similar line keeping close to the lower part of the life-line. The farther the life-line and this accompanying line go towards the rascettes, the farther the last marriage goes on in life.

"A subscriber" wants to know if a deep line from the top of the Mount of Mercury and cutting the line of marriage will hinder the marriage? If the marriage is not unmistakably indicated on the fate-line or the life-line, yes.

"C. R." will find her reading in the October number. "Anxious" asks a lot of questions that are impossible to answer unless I could see her and examine the actual hand; and even then I would not undertake the impossible.

was born with some peculiar tendencies but improves upon his natural conditions as he growsolder. His life-line in the right hand is too deep for the best of health; should say should say he had a paternal inheritance of some kind that will affect his life after the age of fifteen. He will live, however, to be sixty-five or seventy and will not have much trouble aside from this matter of the health. Some affair of the heart, in which he will meet with opposition either from his or her people will affect him seriously about the age of twenty-five, and he will, as the phrase is, "go all to pieces over it." But he will recover, although he will not, so far as I can see now, marry. These lines, however, are very liable to change, as the lines on a young boy's or girl's hand are all liable to great changes; therefore too much dependence should not be placed on their readings. Cheiro will not read a child's hand between the ages of six weeks and eighteen years, for the reason that the lines change that. He will never make an orator so he ought not to undertake the law or the ministry.

"L. O. U." has a remarkably good hand, indicative of a singularly strong, fine character. She has two breaks in her life-line that I do not like very well, but as they are not borne out by the left hand I think she will overcome their evil effects. I should say, however, there had been a serious illness about the age of twenty and would be another not far from fifty years of age, which she will survive; if the latter, she will live to be eighty or more. She needs to be very careful of her health between forty-five and fifty-five. She had some remarkable preservation from serious accident or trouble about the age of thirty—a trouble that affected the heart as well as the head; she may not realize how great this was, but it is plainly written in the square that shows on both lifewritten in the square that shows on both life-line and heart-line. She has a splendid fate-line and would make her way anywhere; would make a fine business woman as she has all the qualifications necessary to success. She is a splendid wife and mother. whereby the ambitious can gain WEALTH, POWER, POSITION AND HEALTH. Through this course you develop a power that not only controls men and affairs, but through it you are taught that wonderful science which seems to come from the mysterious deep, now known throughout the civilized world as MAGNETIC HEALING. It has been proven that this power lies dormant in every human born into the world. Although this wonderful power has an origin which seems to come from the mysterious deep, it is easily mastered through the plainly written course by Prof. Murphy. You can LEARN AT HOME. The only education necessary, the knowledge to read. Through the knowledge you gain you are able, without the aid of drugs or the surgeon's knife, to

as well as those about you. There are many people, both men and women, who shrink from the em barrassment of making their diseases and infirmities public, and on this account go through the world suffering tortures and pains, but through this method you are able to HEAL YOURSELF IN THE PRIVACY OF YOUR HOME, and in a few days you are in the sunshine of health to the surprise of your acquaintances. Many a modest woman suffering untold agonies from diseases peculiar to her sex has gone to a premature grave rather than subject herself to the embarrassment of an examination. The same can be said of men who suffered from indiscretions that they were ashamed to confess. This grand method permits sufferers of both sex to do away with this embarrassment, for by it they cure themselves without the assistance of anyone. The "BOOK OF HOPE" written by Prof. Murphy in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how you can gain this wonderful influence whereby you become proficient in curing disease and bad habits in yourself and in others, develop mental energy, gratify ambitions and gives you the key to personal and social successes, also teaches you the grandest and best paying profession of the day, as it is an acknowledged fact that there is no profession known today where independence can be so easily gained as through this grand profession. It reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of today.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address, and you will receive this grand book as well as the Magnetic Record, a 32-page illustrated magazine, without any cost whatever to you.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE new mosaic table HE new mosaic table tops are within the reach of all, for they are made from the pieces of china which result from breakage that is much more frequent in most households than the owner of the China enjoys.

As soon as enough pieces have been collected to cover a white paint. Its height and shape of legs as being suitable for a card table, should be considered.

It is first necessary that a piece of moulding about half an inch in width, should be set all around the top of the table, and as its corners require to be well mitred, it is best to have this done by a carpenter. The table is then in readiness to receive its china top.

First fill the entire space within the moulding with putty, so that it rises to a height about equal with menulding. The various bits of china are then taken up separately and pressed into the putty, until the whole surface of the table is covered.

When this is accomplished the effect produced is something like a mosaic, or a piece of crazy patch work. Of course any particular scheme can be worked out in this way. For instance, a top made entirely of bits of blue and white china would be charming.

Or, if one has enough pieces of a similar color, a star can be fashioned to radiate from the center. White china also can be blocked in to produce a smart effect. It is always a point to be remembered that the putty hardens quickly, and the pieces should therefore be first collected and set in at once, if possible, during the same day. As they sink the soft material naturally rises up between them and forms putty ridges that must be smoothed down until exactly even with the china.

It is now desirable to go over the surface with a coating of shellac, applied with a small camelhair brush. After this has been done it is a good scheme to put the whole thing away for a day or two, or until it has become perfectly solid and dry.

The final touch, and one that adds greatly to the beauty of the top, is to cover all the lines of putty with the same sort of gilt used to regild old picture frames. This, too, should be done with a fine camel-hair brush. After this, a good washing with cold water is about all a good washing with cold water is about all that the table requires.

There probably never was a child, whether boy or girl, who hasn't at some time made tubular worsted trimming on a spool, into one end of which four pins have been stuck. The penwiper herewith illustrated is made in this way of black worsted. When enough has been made it is formed into shape by means of bonnet wire, inserted inside the roll of worsted, for the body, legs, tail and arms. The head is made of black kid over a ball of worsted and the face is painted with water-color. Strands of the worsted form the hair. Country-house visiting has become such an institution in these days that there are few people who do not spend at any rate a few days in the year among their friends and relations.

One spare room, at least, is an absolute essential in all well-to-do houses now, and the housewife who really takes a pride in her establishment should manage to make it one of the prettiest bedrooms in the house. It is generally daintily furnished, and to all outward appearance leaves little to be desired. Yet many visitors whose stay in the house would otherwise be very pleasant, have to endure endless discomforts, which a little foresight and tact would entirely obviate.

However small a visitor's room may be, it is always advisable to squeeze a writing table into it. Many people prefer writing in their own rooms, where they can be quiet and undisturbed, and a hostess should see that they are duly provided with writing materials. The inkstand should be full, the paper rack and blotting book well supplied, new pens should be in the holders, there should be a penwiper, and also an almanac with the correct day of the month indicated, and a waste paper basket under the table.

The bookcase should be filled with books suitable to the taste of the occupant, and there should be a few current magazines left in the room—not back numbers, but up-to-date ones. The houses where people have the best times and where they want to go again, are the free and easy ones, where the hostess plans various forms of amusement and entertainment for her guests, and lets them choose those that suit guests, and lets them choose those that suit them best, or stay quietly in the house and read or rest. It was a hippant Englishman who observed "This civilization of ours is all well enough but hardly up to date, don't you know." And when we read all the doings in China and the mobs at home we are almost compelled to endorse the spirit of his remark.

Another scientist has come to the front with a method of extracting gold from common white sand. He will doubtless find himself badly handicapped by the experience of those who invested heavily in the company that was to find gold in the salty water a year or two

The Christmas story like the poor is always with us. No one has equalled Dickens in his fun and pathos. His Christmas Carols will bear rereading as often as the Christmas season comes around. No better expression of the spirit of the day can be made than Tiny Tim's "God bless us all."

Observant people notice that the last few years have shown a wonderful increase in the number of readers of good books in the rural districts. In the villages and hamlets of the country many reading clubs have been formed and the book purchasers now number hundreds where dozens were not found a little while ago. Publishers who have been acquainting the public with their books only through city dailies will soon learn that many of their most profitable customers are found in remote regions and among people whose access to daily papers is very irregular.

After five years spent in a journey around the globe, Mark Twain has returned to America. He recently commented upon the thing that impressed him most forcibly in America. We are, he says, "The Ungrammatical Nation." The bad English is not confined to the illiterate but college professors, ministers and editors, the intellectual aristocracy of the nation constantly violate all the rules of rhetoric and gram-the mad rush of the age. A recent writer attributes the change in women's manners to the disuse of the fan. This weapon of the coquette was once an indispensable article. The modern woman has hardly time to fan herself or to use the fan as an expression of moods. A bit of old time pleasantry was a fan drill, in which each motion was significant from the command "Flutter your fans" to the last "Ground your fans." The suggestion that a Chair of Courtesy be established in women's colleges was intended as a rebuke to the women who believe that education and business opportunities excuse a disregard for the graces of living. If a fan drill were allowed to be introduced as a part of the athletic training that women affect, a part of the work of the "courtesy professor" might be saved.

The mosquito has been universally hated and detested upon its own merits. He did once necessary about the little pest without making statements that were fit to print. Now it seems that science has fastened upon the insect who has been only annoying, the responsibility of propagating fevers. The experiments made by two physicians who summered upon the deadly Roman plains, have convinced them that a person protected from the bite of the mosquito was immune from the fever. Other experiences and experiments seem to firmly establish the theory as a fact. For some time scientists have studied means of exterminating the mosquito. Now that it has been found to be a menace to health as well as an annoyance, all efforts will be bent towards the extermination of the deadly insect.

The old saying that Christme: comes but once a year is subject to individual interpretation. It is a relief or a regret as the spirit of the individual may determine. The man who feels compelled by circumstance and custom to spend large sums of money in Christmas offerings to all and each who may be in his employ thinks with a grateful air, "Thank heaven it comes but once a year." The woman who wears herself out in trying to carry out the idea that a gift should be personal handiwork breathes a sigh of thankfulness that after all "Christmas comes but once a year." The optimistic person who witnesses the general "good-will-to-men," sport of the season regrets that the day that calls forth all this display of kindliness comes but once a year. It is the expression of our thought for others that makes the spirit of the day beautiful. It is the giving because we wish it and not because it is expected that furnishes the personal pleasure. Not all the abuses and extravagances and excesses with which we have grown to surround the season can take from it its kindly glow.

That people would not go to see Shakespeare played has been a popular idea of late years. This winter has seen a genuine Shakesperian revival. In New York, Richard Mansfield has revival. In New York, Richard Mansfield has put Henry V. upon the stage with a magnificence of stage furnishings and costumes never equalled in America and not exceeded in Europe. Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet and many of Shakespeare's comedies have been seen for the first time in years. The stage of this winter is distinctly literary. More than half the new plays are book adaptations. David Harum, Janice Meredith, Richard Carvel and To Have and to Hold were last season's ropuler books. and to Hold were last season's popular books and are this season's popular plays. In fact it would be hard to name a book that has won any would be hard to name a book that has won any degree of popularity which has not been put upon the stage. These appeal to the popular interest of the moment but are an advance both intellectually and morally from the "problem plays" that have filled the stage. The best and most helpful part of the literary departure of the stage lies, however, in the vogue of Shakespeare. No better test of the strong human interest of the great master can be found than that shown through the interest that children always take in a Shakesperian play. The number of children in the theaters during the winter has been noticeable and it is the Shakespeare play that has brought them. peare play that has brought them.

There seems to be a peculiar thought transference as to ways and means of raising money for churches, charitable work, etc. The old time list included such recreations as necktie socials, box socials, poverty parties, donkey parties, sheet and pillow case parties and all weird and grotesque combinations of fun and finance. No sooner did one form of money making develop itself than the whole population seemed to be familiar with the idea and from Eastport to Sitka the dimes and dollars of the great American people were coaxed from their pockets by similar entertainments. The latest, newest and most exhilarating development of the old idea is the popular "Rummage Sale." All the odds and ends of the garrets, good, bad and indifferent are gathered. What one person has cast aside may just suit the need of his neighbor. The sale appeals to a few wellknown weaknesses of human nature. First and foremost is the possibility of a bargain. Then who does not enjoy a rummage in the attic! To be able to inspect the spoils of a whole neighborhood of atties is a temptation too strong for average humanity and therefore the rummage ale finds a ready market for the "rummage" and a store of shekels for the object of the sale. What a place of disposal for the ill chosen and superfluous offerings that Kriss Kringle brings in his pack.

ly violate all the rules of rhetoric and grammatical construction. A certain New England clergyman used to be known to the frivolous summer visitors as "Should have went," this being a favorite expression of his. This is but a single illustration of the careless English that makes us deserving of the title that Mark Twain bestows.

Periodically the cry goes up that grace and courtesy and leisure are all being sacrificed in the mad rush of the age. A recent writer at busy down town section and a large club numbering fifteen hundred women have established a lunch room in the heart of the shopping district. Quiet, good service and a pleasant place to rest are to be found at both these clubs. place to rest are to be found at both the for women away from home for the day gains added strength in the rural districts. The farmer's men away from home for the day gains added strength in the rural districts. The farmer's wife who wished to drive into town with her husband has often been obliged to give up the expedition as she had no place to stay after her shopping was finished. The average hotel made no provision for her and if she had no near friend to "drop in" upon she found herself literally in the street. It was easier to stay at home and so the day that might have brought needed change into her life was given up. In many small towns the women's clubs have taken the initiative in fitting up a "rest room" for the farmers' wives. A cozy room with comfortable chairs, a couch, heat and light, is fitted up in some central location. Many towns have farmers sheds where horses Many towns have farmers sheds where horses may be driven under cover and cared for dur-ing the stop in town. Many of the shed owners gladly give a room for this purpose and the merchants of the town contribute towards its detested upon its own merits. He did once achieve a feeble literary distinction through a great writer's "Ode to a Mosquito". With great unanimity he has been declared odious by people who felt they could say all that was merchants of the town contribute towards its furnishings. In many places like this it is possible to procure a cup of tea or a light lunch. The idea is a most excellent one. It is practical from the business point of view for it attracts trade. It is philanthropic in spirit for it brings a touch of pleasure and comfort into the lives of women who are cut off from the social pleasures and interest of town life. Towns which contain a Grange Hall might utilize that room or a part of it. Women have been the home makers and planners of comfort for others for ages but these little manifestations of interest for the comfort of the festations of interest for the comfort of the woman away from home are new enough and novel enough to mark the beginning of a new century.

MUSICAL INSECTS IN JAPAN.

Japan is a country of oddities, and its people are noted for their love of dwarf nature, producing in the minute all forms of trees, flowers, etc. Their marvelous ingenuity shows in everything that they undertake of this kind, and a success of theirs, which is very little known, is their training of singing insects.

In almost all countries singing birds are esteemed, but it is only in Japan that the musical sounds emitted by insects are appreciated; and for many centuries it has been a custom of the Japanese to listen to these musical singers.

In any of the Japanese cities in the spring time, and way into the month of June, one sees suspended under the verandas of the houses little cages of bamboo, from which break upon the silence of the fresh twilight the strange whistling of metallic modulations and light trills which fill the air with delicate and delicious music. The Japanese hour of bath is in the evening, and after this refreshment it is the custom of the Japanese to sit upon the verandas, clad in kimonos, and listen to the music of these minute songsters.

The most prized of these singular insects is the suzumushi, which means in Japanese, insect bell, and the sound of its voice is that of a tiny silver bell. It is a little black beetle with a long flat body. delicious music. The Japanese hour of bath is are varied strident noises, while others are remarkable for shrillness or clearness. One insect sings only at midnight, and the sound is that of a far away clock; and it has a Japanese name equivalent to midnight chimes.

In the city of Tokio, there are over forty merchants who deal only in singing insects. The commerce itself is of recent origin, although the people have delighted in the training of these insects and have listened to them. though the people have delighted in the training of these insects and have listened to them for many centuries; and it is no uncommon sight, especially among the more conservative Japanese who preserve the ways of the ancient regime, to see little parties of picturesque Japanese in their native costume, extended on mats, drinking tea, and listening with rapt attention to the various sounds emitted from the little bamboo cages placed on stands in front of them. About one hundred years ago. front of them. About one hundred years ago, a Japanese named Choso, following the usual Japanese custom, had collected in the season a Japanese custom, had collected in the season a number of these singing beetles. He placed them in a large vase, and entirely forgot them; and found early the next spring nearly one hundred young beetles had hatched out. He became interested in this fact, and from these one hundred bred a large number the next season. From this accident sprang the breeding of these beetles, and their artificial propagation; so that for a century these insects have been bred for the express purpose of singing. been bred for the express purpose of singing, the same as dealers in our own country breed canaries. Gradually this has evolved into a line of commerce which extends over the entire attracted A man who has attracted great notice to himself is Charles D. Evans, of Janesville, Wis. who is now traveling in the West, and his ap-pearance on the street creates a profound impression.

Not only is Mr. Evans a musician of rare talent, but combines with this a high order of inventive genius, which he has brought to bear on his own life in such a manner that he is rapidly acquiring a fortune through his performances upon his remarkable mechanical musical inarrive in the has perfected an instrument, or rather a lot of instruments, which are compactly carried in a little four wheeled cart, and which by a species of clock work are so united that they play together in unison or separately as the operator, who is Mr. Evans, may wish. He can produce the effect of a whole orchestra, and it is said the most complicated part is that and it is said the most complicated part is that which produces the effects of the tenor and bass drums. Mr. Evans says himself that he spent several years perfecting this one part. Besides giving unique concerts upon his musical invention, Mr. Evans sings with a sweet tenor voice to the accompaniment of a guitar. tenor voice to the accompaniment of a guitar. He is also a famous violin player. The violin, which he picked up in Philadelphia, bears the faded writing on the inside showing it was made by Giovanni Grancino, Milan, 1721. Grancino was one of the most noted of violin makers, and the present instrument, picked up in a Philadelphia second-hand store, is worth a small fortune.

It is almost wonderful what a man deprived of his sight is often able to do. Not only has great music offer which gives the best sheet Mr. Evans accomplished what is above shown in the musical line, but he has learned to converse in two languages, reads the blind system of his sight is often able to do. for the blind.

He has a taste for high literature, and beside having read a great deal, he has produced two or three creditable compositions for the violin, and written some poetry. Musical critics who have heard his violin compositions say that the Voice of the Wind is a very pathetic and soothing piece in the minor key. In the Christmas Carol, another piece for the violin, he has very successfully imitated the laughter and play of children at Christmas, the singing of the lullaby, the coming of Santa Claus, the filling of the stockings, and the early carols. This would be a very striking piece written by any one in full possession of his faculties; but produced by a man hampered by blindness, it is a little short of wonderful.

BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

EVERAL interesting inventions have recently been added to the list of bicycle improvements and I shall give you several; only don't ask me for addresses because I cannot give them. A feature of the "Electra" a French automobile driven by a motor which obtains its power from a galvanic battery, is the truss frame, in which the rear axle is done away with, the driving wheels being hung independently on each side. This device was necessitated in order to make room beneath the seat for the motor and the battery. This vehicle, which has a traveling radius of about 37 miles, weighs but 378 pounds.

This device is illustrated herewith. Col. Pope of "Columbia" fame exhibits something much like it.

This device is illustrated herewith. Col. Poge of "Columbia" fame exhibits something much like it.

The evident adaptability of the automobile to the ordinary uses of the physician has resulted in the appearance of fully half a dozen different types of doctor's buggy, many of them entirely too heavy for the work which they will be called on to perform. The builders of the "Aesculapius" the small, strong and compact vehicle shown in the accompanying illustration appear to have struck the right chord. This self propelled carriage, despite its small size, is quite capable of performing its professional duties and of being used meantime as a pleasure-driving turnout. Measuring over all but 6.5x4.4 feet, its weight, without passengers, is but 440 pounds. It has a two-speed gear, and is capable of a maximum speed of 17 miles an hour. This compact little vehicle is a hill climber par excellence, the low-speed gear being used on all heavy up grades. It would appear, therefore, that this buggy is particularly suitable for country physicians.

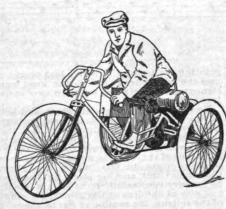

The wheel has done much for humanity in the way of recreation and in the promotion of beatth, but its prondest record is what it has

The wheel has done much for humanity in the way of recreation and in the promotion of health, but its proudest record is what it has accomplished in the good roads movement. A city's attractiveness, its availability as a place for manufacturing and commerce and its prosperity generally depends to a large extent on the condition of its avenues of communication. What is true regarding the city can be asserted with more force in speaking of the farming section. Good roads bring the farmer's market almost to his dooryard.

The wheel has been a benefactor to the merchants, to the manufacturer and to the farmer in its successful work for better roads. The bicycle is no longer a "fad" to be ridiculed and abused. It is a factor in the progress toward a higher civilization. It ought not to be necessary to say that rapid and easy transit on land is absolutely impossible without good roads.

The first step toward a decided improvement in the construction of roads is to develop a sense of their badness. The bicycle made its first appearance in America at the time of the centennial, and it found the roads of this country in a shocking condition. Drivers of horses are not close observers of the highway, and they were not awake to the need of improvements. Wheelmen are close and frequent observers of the roads. In their excursions they obtain a personal and often excruciating sense of the imperfections of the roadways. They feel the jolt from every hole, they have to tug hard at it over every sandy section, and every muddy spot is a muscle strainer. They see a bad road, as it were, with a magnifying glass, and their anatomy pays for it. Wheelmen used to have no regard whatever for the opinion of a road given by a non-rider. They had their ideas of a perfect roadway, and they began to preach the gospel of good roads. They organized as the League of American Wheelmen, and began to work for the creation of a healthy public opinion in favor of better roadways. They were persistently aggressive. roads.

The first step toward a decided improvement

DOCTOR'S AUTO-CARRIAGE.

They knew how to agitate, to petition and to memorialize. To lethargic or ill-informed road commissioners they supplied needed information plans and specifications for desired improvements. They flooded the country with literature upon the good roads question. They sent lecturers to talk upon the subject. They went to legislatures and asked for highway laws. They went to Congress and persuaded that body to add a road inquiry bureau to the agricultural department. Wheelmen were called events at first, but they kept pounding that body to add a road inquiry bureau to the agricultural department. Wheelmen were called cranks at first, but they kept pounding away, and they would be heard.

And now after many years of agitation we see better roads all over the country. The wheelman was the pioneer in the movement for good roads and he is still its most earnest advocate. In his organized capacity he is still educating the public and he is pointing to the object lessons which the good roads of Massachusetts, of New Jersey, of New York and Pennsylvania present.

In any statement about the commercial aspect of the development of the bicycle industry, some preference should be made to the financial advantages of good roads. To comprehend the far-reaching financial benefits of good roads, one has but to consider that throughout the United States there are more than 1,000,000 miles of highway and that the saving of a few cents per mile in the cost of hauling produce to and from railway stations and shipping points would in one year mount up to a sum sufficient for the construction of a majority of the roads now needed east of the Mississippi.

majority of the roads now needed east of the Mississippi.

As the success of one leading merchant assists hundreds of smaller concerns, so the healthful development of a new industry is of material advantage to those who supply the increased demand in special lines. The perfection of the bicycle has opened a large market for steel and rubber, has resulted in revolutionizing the method of drawing seamless steam tubes, and has wonderfully improved the manufacture of rubber goods. Instead of importing tubing from England, as was done in the early days of the trade, this product is supplied now by American makers, and some of it for the purpose is better than any other tubing now known. It took years to advance from the old-fashioned solid rubber tire to the single tube tire of to-day. This one line of development has cost a great deal of money, both in the way of experimentation and in the equipment of plants. There are hundreds of patent devices covering tires, and the method

To the merchant, the professional man, clerks who sit all day at their desks, tired sales women, who sit all day at their desks, thet sates who, artisans, mechanics, laborers who desire to reach their morning work more promptly and to return home in season at night, the wheel is an incalculable source not only of pleasure but also of utility.

Of bicycling it may be said that it is a more pleasing and altogether desirable form of recreation than, in many instances, it appears to be.

Were Burns writing to-day I feel assured he

"Oh wad some power the giftie gie us To see oursel's as others see us! I'm sure it would induce the 'scorcher' To quit 'that hump' of seeming torture."

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: Here we are again at the holiday season, with our hearts full of the desire for the happiness of others and our hands full of work which is to help us in giving that happiness, co I'll not detain you with any further remarks but will open my budget of letters at once.

The first one gives us a pleasant treat in the description of the plantation home of our noted General, Joseph Wheeler. I have found it very in-

"There is nothing of interest in the appearance of the little yellow depot, the two store buildings or the half a dozen dwelling houses clustered near the station; but as the train rounds the curve and rolls in sight of the depot, and the goodnatured flagman shouts, 'Wheeler Station!' the passengers rush to the car windows and platform and eagerly ask Sambo, who has 'jes come down to de dipo to see de chars pass', to point out the plantation home of 'Fighting Little Joe'.

"Wheeler Station is situated in Lawrence county, Alabama, on the Memphis and Chattanooga division of the Southern railroad. The little village was named in honor of Gen. Joseph Wheeler, whose home for many years has been on a plantation which surrounds the village. Some three hundred yards south of the depot stands the old Wheeler homestead, which is a large two-story frame structure of anti-bellum design. The magnificent mahogany furniture within is as anti-bellum in appearance as the house itself, while the grand staircase reminds one of some celebrated architecture of past centuries. The picture gallery contains pictures of General Wheeler from childhood to the present day, besides numerous pictures of the other members of the Wheeler family.

"A short distance south of the house is the Wheeler graveyard where members of the general's immediate family and a number of other relatives lie sleeping. The general's wife, who died in Washington city in 1896, sleeps in this old plantation cemetery and her grave is marked by a monument of Georgia marble some twenty-five feet high. To the left of Mrs. Wheeler's grave is that of the general's son, Thomas Wheeler, who was drowned while in bathing at Montauk Point, N. Y., at the close of the Spanish-American war.

"On the north of the house, extending to the railroad, is a magnificent forty-acre grove of gigantic oaks which have witnessed the changing scenes of many decades. In this grove is a spring of immense size which supplies the engines on the Southern Railroad with water. During the war between the states there were camped in this grove from time to time the armies of General Albert Sidney Johnston, General Forrest, General Hood, General Buell and many others of lesser note.

"The plantation contains seventeen thousand acres and is one of the largest and most fertile plantations in the south. About half of it is under cultivation and the annual cotton crop, to say nothing of the corn, amounts to about fifteen hundred bales. The plantation is cultivated by negro 'shore-cropers' under the wise and careful superintendence of the general's oldest daughter, Miss Lucy Louise Wheeler. In the absence of Miss Wheeler the plantation is superintended by Toney Davis, a trusty colored man.

"During General Wheeler's long term of service in the United States' Congress he always would spend his vacations at this quiet plantation with his family, and it was there, in that dreamy old home, surrounded by stately trees and beautiful flowers, that all of the general's congressional campaigns were planned."

Our next letter takes us among the "Moonshiners" of Tennessee.

"In Appalachian America, called by a recent writer, 'Uncle Sam's backyard,' and which extends from West Virginia to southern Georgia, a constant warfare is being waged between the illicit distillers, poetically called 'Moonshiners', and a small army of revenue officers. The average moonshiner is a rough-looking individual at all times, although it is seldom the outside world gets more than a passing glimpse of him, except when luck has been against him, and he has been dragged from his lair to have justice meted out to him in the Federal Courts. There are those among them however who, like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, lead dual lives, administering the law as Justices of the Peace, or constables, and breaking it as manufacturers of whiskey, 'sub rosa' (sub luna rather). The fiery 'mountain dew' finds ready sale in the lowlands, retailed by trusted agents of the distillers. They do not regard themselves as law breakers, and look upon the government machinery for their suppression as unjust and oppressive. And still they are highly patriotic, and proved their loyalty by fighting to a man, almost, for the Union, in the civil war. Their homes, in most cases, are huts, primitive indeed, which cling like swallowness to the mountainside, surrounded by almost perpendicular 'patches' of corn, potatoes, tobacco or sorghum. "Science cuts no appreciable figure in the con-huts, primitive indeed, which cling like swallownests to the mountainside, surrounded by almost perpendicular 'patches' of corn, potatoes, tobacco or sorghum.

"Science cuts no appreciable figure in the concotion of their forbidden product. They, as their fathers before them, content themselves with the simplest of tools. A brief description of a deserted still seen by the writer on Unacoi mountain will furnish some idea of their primitive methods. A hut of rough logs was tucked snugly between the sides of a ravine and completely hidden by dense thickets of laurel and ivy. The shutterless door disclosed a lot of tubs and kegs, a piece of coiled copper wire, and a huge iron kettle. This completed the outfit of a moonshiner whose 'establishment' was in flourishing running order until within a few days of our visit, a threatened raid from 'them revenue fellows' having frightened off the owners. Not always do the brave officers secure such a bloodless victory as in this instance, however. Many of them are met by armed resistance, and often lose their lives in the discharge of their dangerous duties. The moonshiners, strange to say, are often deeply religious, and when a number of them are in jail together will pass their time in loud singing and prayer. Taken as a class they are a singular people, and present the most startling moral contrasts. They prove the importance of environment in a topographical sense and but for those blue barriers that shut them in from progress and civilization would be as well educated, as lawabiding and as commonplace and uninteresting as the more or less cultured denizens of the valley which the railroad, college and fashion plates have made just like the rest of the world.

"Communication with the outside world will alone solve the problem upon whose solution the government is spending large amounts of money, and the lives of many of its officials; but it will doubtless be many years yet 'ere civilization penetrates to these mountains."

Rose Lame Brown, Athens, Tennessee.

Here are a few words from a North Carolina Dousin:

"Dare, the most eastern county in North Carolina, named in honor of the first English child born on American soil, is also the most interesting. While its surface is mostly water, its land area consists of long, narrow peninsulars and islands.

"More than three hundred years ago a colony sent by Sir Walter Raleigh and commanded by Gov. John White, landed at Roanoke, one of the principal islands. After laying out the city of Raleigh, on the northern side of the island, they made Mantoe, the brave-hearted Indian, with the title 'Lord of Roanoke', the first American baron. In a few weeks after the settlement was made Elenora Dare, Gov. White's daughter, gave birth to an infant, who was christened Virginia, after the territory named in honor of Elizabeth, the Virgin Queen of England.

"In a few days after this event White, realizing the needs of his people, went to England in their interest. He was delayed for some time, and when he again landed on the lonely island his people had all disappeared. On a tree in rude letters was the word 'Croaton'; this, with some scattered bones were the only visible signs that life had ever been on the island, and the strange disappearance of the people is still veiled in mystery.

"A romantic conjecture is that they took refuge with the Croatons, a tribe of Indians on the mainland, that Elenora Dare taught the savage children, and a pale-faced, blue-eyed tribe still exists, thought to be the offsprings of Virginia."

I also thank Minnie Beach, of Calhoun County, Illinois, for a pleasant letter.

I am sure of a warm welcome from all my nieces and nephews for anything from Porto Rico, so I am glad to have the following letter for you. One thing I would like to say before you read it, however, and that is, that although we do, most of us, call the island "Porto Rico" the official spelling of the name, as decided by the National Board on Geographic Names, and later by the President of the United States, is the same as that used by the inhabitants of the island, "Puerto Rico."

inhabitants of the island, "Puerto Rico."

"The island of Porto Rico, as Americans call it, though the Spanish is Puerto Rico, meaning 'rich port', covers an area of three thousand seven hundred square miles. The length of the island is ninety-five miles, width thirty-five miles, and the coast line measures three hundred and seventy miles. When discovered by Columbus in 1493 the natives of Puerto Rico were Caribs of the Indian race. It was not a large race and gradually decreased in numbers until it entirely disappeared early in the present century, though many traces of it are still found in the peasant class called Peons.

"At present the population consists of Spaniards, Negroes and Creoles, and numbers by the census taken last winter 953,243 persons. It is the most densely populated of our new possessions, averaging two hundred and sixty-four persons to the square mile.

"In the earliest days of record, the island was the scene of many attacks from buccaneers and pirates and several unsuccessful freebooting excursions were made against it after the Spanish had conquered the aborigines early in the sixteenth century. An English attack was made upon San Juan, the capital, in 1475, but it was repulsed. For over one hundred years after that, with the exception of a revolution in 1820, the island was free from war. As everyone knows, the United States easily wrested it from Spanish control in 1898.

"It has evidently been the desire of Spanish property owners and officials to keep the outside world in ignorance of the rich attractions of Puerto Rico. This gem of the sea, one of the loveliest and most fertile islands of the world, abounding in natural resources and advantages, beautiful in scenery and delightful in climate, was very little known to the United States previous to its acquisition. To the traveler from the States, especially from the northern section, arriving in winter, the appearance is delightfully inviting with its suggestion of perpetual spring. In the picture-sque beauty of its hills and valleys and its charming dress of luxuriant vegetation, its masses of gorgeously colored flowers and its stately trees of the plains and mountains, the natural attractions of the plains and mountains, the natures at a series of the plains and sunshine, flowers and smiles."

"Barre, Vermont, is an interesting little city.
The air there seems highly rarefied and makes one feel as though brisk movements were pleasurable.
A peculiarity of this place is the absence of old people. Nearly everybody seems young or middle aged.

A peculiarity of this place is the absence of old people. Nearly everybody seems young or middle aged.

"There are about ten thousand inhabitants and the business men pull together in their successful efforts to continue the health, growth and prosperity of the city, while the large number of fine residences tell their own story of rewarded labor. "The educational system is excellent. One of the model graded schools cost about $48,000. The Goddard Seminary, named in honor of T. A. Goddard of Boston who contributed $10,000 toward its erection, with its nice grounds and tasteful fountain, adds a pretty finishing touch to the town. "The vast amount of beautiful granite of superior quality, about eighty acres of which have already been uncovered, is largely responsible for the phenomenal growth of the city within the past few years. There are at present seventy-five quarries in operation, giving employment to about three thousand men. One of these quarries is said to be the largest monumental quarry in the world. Barre granite, when polished, is a dark blue gray, very rich and beautiful in appearance, and as its durability is unsurpassed there is a large demand for it for mausoleums, vaults, monoliths and so forth from all parts of the United States. The equestrian statue of General Grant in Lincoln Park stands on a base of this granite, and the Crucifix monument standing in the Catholic cemetery of Pine Hill, New York, a superb work of art and the largest crucifix monument in the world cut from a single stone, is of Barre granite. Twenty pair of horses were required to draw this monument from the railroad to its present resting place. The famous Rockefeller monument is also of Barre granite.

"Barre uses the best and most modern machinery for working its quarries, and one of its derricks is

"Barre uses the best and most modern machinery for working its quarries, and one of its derricks is said to be the largest in the world. In polishing the granite iron is first used, then emery, and lastly a powder called putty powder, which is made of tin and is quite expensive.

"The city has recently added to its artistic possessions a beautiful statue of Robert Burns, constructed entirely of Barre granite. This work was conceived and executed by a brilliant young Scotch-American. J. Massey Rhind. It stands twenty-two feet ten inches high and is eight feet square at the base. It has two bases, the first of which is perfectly plain while the second has an inscription and beautiful carvings. These carvings are in fine relief and represent scenes from some of the best works of the poet. The one which most appeals to me is that depicting "Tam O'Shanter's Ride". On Tam's face the expression of fright is perfect, while the witches who are chasing him, the front one holding fast to the tail of Tam's mare,

The whole is surmounted by a marvelously lifelike statue of the poet.

"Barre is frequently called the Aberdeen of America, because its scenery so strongly resembles that of Scotland. Many intelligent Scotch families are also settled here."

Here is a very curious story sent you by a Georgia cousin.

Georgia cousin.

"In the days before the war there lived in an adjoining county to this a very wicked old slave owner. He had a pretty country home, a good wife and several children, owned many acres of timberland and a great many slaves; one of these, a young mulatto, was a special favorite, and he left his wife and home with this girl and lived with her for some time. Long before his death he swore that he would cheat the devil of his soul when he did die, and said he would not be buried in the ground. He had huge pine posts hewn out and set into the ground, extending about fifteen feet above it, and on these posts he had a little house, large enough to hold a coffin, built of thick hewn logs. He then had a coffin made to fit the house and put away to await his death. He told his oldest son that when he died it would be his duty to see that his body was put into this coffin in this house and the door sealed up.

"Years passed by, the war came and freed his negroes. His wife died and his children were scattered in different parts of the state. Finally the old man was stricken down with fever and died. None of his children lived near him and his neighbors were preparing to put his body in the ground beside that of his wife; but his son heard of his father's death and hastened home to carry out his father's death and hastened home to carry out his father's instructions. He had the old coffin brought out from the tiny house, placed his father's oby within it and restored it to the house, sealing it up as he had been directed.

"The tiny old house containing the coffin is standing now, but the old man's bones were not allowed to rest in peace. A young medical student once took the skull and kept it awhile, but it is said that the old man's spirit would not let him have any peace till he had returned it. People passing through that section of the country would go out of their way to see the place, and many of them carried away with them as souvenirs, bones of the poor old sinner. This story is a true one. Any one i

THE PLANTIN MUSEUM.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

O book-lovers few places are more inter-esting than the home of one of the earliest masters of the "art preservative of arts," the Plantin Museum at Antwerp. Very lit-tle is known definitely tle is known definitely about the invention of printing—some writers giving the credit to one, and some to other aspirants. Gutenberg is commonly spoken of as the first printer from movable types, though his claim is questioned. Unfortunately, none of the questioned. Unfortunately, none of the implements of the earliest days of the art have been preserved. Gutenberg's house at Mayence is now a beershop, and the shops of other old printers have long been destroyed or long been destroyed or devoted to other uses. The Plantin Museum is the only old printing-office that is still preserved. It was bought by the city of Antwerp in 1876, from the last member of the founder's family, for 120,000 francs. It is the least imposing of Antwerp's public buildings, giving no hint from the outside of the treasures that are to be seen within. Over the door is a little tablet, bearing the device of Plantin, the founder of the house. It is a hand emerging from clouds holding an open compass which is encircling Plantin's trade-mark "Labore et Constantia," labor and patience. It is an appropriate motto for its user. The Plantin Museum is the only old print-

Plantin was born in 1514 in France, where he Plantin was born in 1514 in France, where he learned and also taught printing and bookbinding. In 1548 he moved to Antwerp with his family where in time he gained a reputation of being a skillful decorator. One night he was mistaken by a ruffian for another man and was stabbed, and was forever disabled from working at his trade. In 1555 he had established a printing office but at that time the

tion of being a skillful decorator. One night he was mistaken by a ruffian for another man and was stabbed, and was forever disabled from working at his trade. In 1555 he had established a printing office, but at that time the conflict between the press, the state, and the church was sharp and bitter. Plantin was accused of printing heretical books and was obliged to fiee to Paris. Returning twenty months later he found his office had been destroyed and even his household goods sold at auction. Fortunately he secured the aid of some wealthy men and began again. In four years he had the largest office in the world and had printed over 200 different books. At Plantin's office was printed what was then the largest volume in the world, and which is even now regarded by modern printers as a great achievement; the Royal Polyglot Bible, in 8 folio parts and containing parallel texts in Latin, Greek, Hebrew and Chaldee, besides numerous beautiful illustrations from copper. This book was the ruin of Plantin. The King of Spain promised to help him, but failed to do as much as he had agreed. Besides this the work was a great deal more expensive than Plantin had figured it would be. The King would not allow the sale of the Polyglot until the Pope had given his consent. This the popereused to do, but he died soon after and his successor granted the desired permission. Then the book was denounced as heretical and the Inquisition proceeded to forbid its sale until it had been examined, which took some seven years. Meanwhile Plantin had been obliged to mortgage about all he owned, including two-thirds of the book. Soon after this when his fortunes had mended somewhat, the king's soldiers revolted because they were not paid, and Plantin was obliged to pay ransom nine different times to save his office from destruction. Soon after he went to Leyden where he stayed a short time, but again returned to Antwerp, which had in the meanwhile suffered from political changes and was no longer the rich and prosperous city of old. After Pl tries and antique furniture adorn the other apartments, for Plantin was more than a mere printer; he was an artist and surrounded him-

printer; he was an artist and surrounded himself with beautiful examples of the work of his day. In showcases in some of the rooms are exhibited examples of Plantin's work, and that of his engravers.

Facing on a side street are the shops where the books were sold; the shelves still filled with rare and curious volumes. On the walls are posted lists of prohibited books, and laws regarding the sale of books products of the posted lists of prohibited books, and laws regarding the sale of books, products of the Plantin office. In the corner is the chair in which the shop-boy sat, and announced the advent of customers to Plantin's daughters, who kept the store. Then there is the room for the correctors of the press, and on the walls portraits of the dignified and scholarly men who edited and supervised the texts that were printed there, and for wages that seem to us ridiculously small, sometimes as little as two or three florins a volume. The printing-room is beyond, with its row of seven rude handpresses, and type-cases and stands occupying the remainder of the space. To the modern printer it seems impossible that from this meagre equipment such an array of beautiful books could be produced. Yet some of these books are still beautiful specimens of printing and engraving, and far surpass some more and engraving, and far surpass some more modern examples. Besides the printing-office there are two rooms where the type was moulded. Plantin was accustomed to pay the best engravers to cut the moulds for his types, which his workmen moulded. Here are exhibited the kettles and tools used by them. From an artistic point of view it is doubtful if the work of these early designers of type will ever be equalled; in fact, most of the popular styles of type of the present day are copied from these old designs.

But one of the most interesting rooms in the museum for the most interesting rooms in the museum for the book-lover is the library. Plantin's own library of over fourteen thousand volumes contains hundreds that are among the rarest known to bibliomaniaes. And besides the printed books, which contain among others the Bible which was Gutenburg's greatest work there are preserved the record greatest work, there are preserved the record books, account books, and much of the cor-respondence of Plantin himself. The more valuable and interesting of these papers have been edited and published by the direction of the museum.

These records are of especial interest. Rich as the museum is in relics of the domestic life of the times, these records give an account of Plantin's life that could never otherwise have Plantin's life that could never otherwise have been obtained. He was evidently a most methodical man, and in these records are found his correspondence with artists, scholars, and authors, his weekly bills of workmen, his inventories and other business papers; his letters to the King of Spain, urging that worthy to pay his bills; his bills from type-founders and engravers; his appeals to money-lenders and book-sellers who wanted too much discount; his dealings with authors and editors, and other interesting documents. Books in those days were sold at what seems now pitifully low prices, but the cost of manufacture was in proportion. Printers and editors were paid very low wages, to say nothing of authors—who were often only too glad of an opportunity to have their books published. Designing and engraving were also much cheaper and book-sellers were allowed a very small margin of profit.

Plantin is not known as the greatest printer of his time, but as the greatest publisher. In technical points he was outdone by rivals in France and the Netherlands; but as a publisher he stands alone. During his life he brought forth more than sixteen hundred editions. By far the greater part of the books read in the 16th century were theological, and Plantin accordingly caused himself to be appointed the official printer of the books of the Roman Catholic church. A permit was given him by the Pope, but his way was beset with difficulties and after he began to print he was obliged to pay ten per cent. of his receipts to the Roman printer who held the privilege. But he persevered and though kept in financial straits for a lifetime, his successors grew rich on a for a lifetime, his successors grew rich on a monopoly which they held for over two hun-

It is with deep regret that one passes from the door of the museum, leaving behind the dreamy days of the 16th century to mingle in the throng of the present day once more.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

American world of letters lost one of its most graceful and writers when Charles Dudley Warner "crossed the bar" on the afternoon of October 20th, 1900.

He was an American citizen of whom his countrymen might feel justly proud.

His death will bring great regret to many readers of his charming books, while his personal friends must have their great sense of loss lessened a little by memories of the sunshine of his presence when he was with them.

Charles Dudley Warner left behind him as a charles Dudley warner left behind him as a record of his literary work a long list of books in which there was none of the cynicism, none of the bitterness, none of the low moral tone that have marked the books of some more popular writers. Not that he was not popular, for he had a large following of admiring readers although none of his books ever created any. although none of his books ever created any-thing like a sensation in the world, nor did they have a phenomenal sale.

This distinguished writer was born in Plainfield, Massachusetts, on the twelfth day of September, in the year 1829. The first thirteen years of his life were spent in Plainfield, and he then went with his widowed mother to Casenovia, New York, to live. He graduated from Hamilton College in the year 1851 and he gave evidence of his superior literary ability at this age by winning the English prize essay the year of his graduation. He contemplated devoting himself to literature and was to have had charge of a literary monthly to be published in Detroit, but the scheme for publishing the magazine was abandoned and Mr. Warner then joined a surveying party on the western frontier.

ner then joined a surveying party on the western frontier.

Later he went to New York City where he studied law, and although he was admitted to the bar and practiced law for several years in Chicago, it was evident that he had more of a literary than a legal "bent," and when the position of assistant editor of the Hartford Press sition of assistant editor of the Hartford Press was offered him he accepted it and went to Hartford, Connecticut, where his home was for the remainder of his life. He traveled much abroad and his letters of foreign travel were so interesting that they attracted wide attention and brought the Hartford Courant, the paper in which they were published, into great prominence.

in which they were published, into great prominence.

In the year 1890 there appeared in the Courant a series of delightful sketches under the title of "My Summer in a Garden." When the series of sketches were completed Mr. Warner was induced to offer them to several publishers for the purpose of having them appear in book form, but the publishers seemed to "fight shy" of them and after one or two refusals Mr. Warner gave up offering them to publishers. Mr. Warner had for a near neighbor at this time Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, and one time when her famous brother, Henry Ward Beecher, was visiting her she invited Mr. Warner to meet him at her house. Something was said about the book Mr. Warner had refused and Mr. Beecher asked to see the copy of it. Mr. Beecher looked the copy of the book over and became most enthusiastic over it.

"This book shall be published," he said with decision. "I will write a preface for the book that will make it go."

He did this and the book did "go." It had a large sale and by many it is regarded as Mr. Warner's most delightful hook.

large sale and by many it is regarded as Mr. Warner's most delightful book. Lovers of fiction of a very high order have been delighted with his novel "A Little Journey Into the World," while his other ventures into the world of fiction have been remarkable for their world of fiction have been remarkable for their great purity of thought and graceful style. There are writers who could have been much better spared than Charles Dudley Warner could be spared. He made many friends while he was editor of the "Easy Chair" and the "Editor's Drawer" in Harper's Magazine. He was one of the most intimate friends of Mark Twain who was one of his neighbors in Hartford. It will be remembered that he and Mark Twain joined forces in writing "The Gilded Age." But the best work of neither writer appears in this book.

A very large number of American readers will wish this writer whom they loved a joyful welcome at the "Gate Beautiful" through which he has gone into the "singing world of happiness".

perhaps because on his day it was formerly the custom for parents to give presents secretly to their children. In Italy these presents are hidden in shoes or slippers, and perhaps the children themselves are responsible for the substitution of the more capacious stocking that is now provided for "St. Nick."

So many and so well known are the customs and traditions that cluster about Christmas that most of them need hardly to be recalled. On Christmas Eve the oxen are said to fall on their knees in their stalls at midnight, while the bees "sing" in their hives, and miners tell of the ringing of underground bells. It is said that Christmas is a holiday for all but the cooks who are always overworked in preparing the dishes that are reserved for this season of the year. The true Christmas pie should be of mince meat and oblong in shape to represent the manger at Bethlehem. They are called "coffins" and their spicy taste is in recognition of the offerings made by the wise men of the East. There is an old proverb that says: "For every house in which a mince pie shall be eaten at the Christmas season, the eater shall enjoy a happy month in the coming year." But what of the days in the immediate present? The Druids held the mistletoe in great veneration and for this pagan association, perhaps, it

The Druids held the mistletoe in great veneration and for this pagan association, perhaps, it is not used with the holly and other winter plants in decorating the churches at Christmas tide. It is no less interesting, however, for being relegated to the kitchen where the young people always see to it that a sprig is to be found in some convenient spot.

The lighting of the Yule-Log was formerly believed to sanctify the roof-tree and it must be kindled with clean hands else it will not burn. And woe to the house upon whose hearth the Yule-Log smoulders or dies out. After it has burned throughout the night and the flames begin to flicker, it should be smothered and the fragment kept to light the next year's fire. In the north of England farmhouses the servants lay by a large, knotty block and while this burns on the hearth they are entitled to certain unusual privileges.

December twenty-eighth, the Holy Innocents Day is considered especially unlucky. An old writer warns us not to "put on a new suit, pare one's nails or begin anything on a Childermas-Day."

Other unlucky days that occur throughout the year are also given to us for our avoidance. They are the first Monday in April, which tradition says is the day on which Cain was born and his brother Abel slain; the second Monday in August, the day on which Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed; and the last Monday in December, the day on which Judas was born. The day of the week on which the fourteenth of May happens to fall is also unlucky for the remainder of that year.

And so ends our calendar of superstition; let him laugh at its absurdities who will, but let him also remember that discretion is the better part of valor. Other unlucky days that occur throughout the

MILY BIBLE FOR $1.89.

DELIVERED AT YOUR HOME.

This edition excels all others in the excellence of paper and exquisite topography, being printed from an entirely new set of plates costing $20,000. The size of page is 12x9 inches, the print large and clear, and there are TEN BEAUTIFUL FULL-PAGE PHOTOGRAVURE PICTURES of rare artistic excellence and some of the most superb masterpieces of Modern Paintings, being in harmony with the justly celebrated Oxford Teachers' Bibles. They are bound in fine Morocco Buckram Paneled Sides, and contain the Old and New Testaments, authorized version, a complete list of contents of each chapter in both Old and New Testaments, giving in concise form the subject on which each chapter treats; for instance, we find in this table that the 5th chapter of Deuteronomy contains the Ten Com-mandents, thus forming a ready reference table. It also gives the number of books, chapters, verses, etc., in the Holy Bible, also gives the number of times many familiar words occur in the work, also a very neat, plain Marriage Certificate and Family Record. Our New Bible is just what the people want; excellent paper, handsome illustrations, good, clear print, handsome and durable bindings, and last but not least, an EXTRAORDINARY FAMILY RECORD, entirely different from that contained in any other Bibles in the country. The print is of large size, clear and distinct, just right for grandfather and grandmother to read without their glasses, while the full-page engravings will interest and instruct the little children.

It is the book for every member of the family.

Our price by mail or express, charges fully paid to your post-office, is only $1.89.

The Buried City of Honduras.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

A MONOLITH.

HE scientific world of to-day anxiously awaits any discoveries which throw light upon the past history of mankind, his way of living, his religion, or his civilization. Every year travelers return from the unknown parts of the earth with new tales of buried cities, ruined temples and inscribed stones which tell of builders who have passed out of HE scientific world have passed out of the knowlege of the civilized world.

such knowledge, and Egypt is always a source of pleasure to the archaeologist, but right here on but right here on our continent is the ruin of a city, buried beneath centuries of dust, and having an unrevealed history which cannot fail to fascinate the lover of the mysterious, while to the archaeologist its revelations and its mysteries are daily telling more of the wonderful story of a civilization older perhaps than Egypt and of the people who lived and built and died while European man still dwelt in caves and used bits of bone for arrow heads.

European man still dwelt in caves and used bits of bone for arrow heads.

In many parts of Honduras are found traces of these people, the Maya people, they are called, but the place most interesting and richest in relies is the city of Copan. Long ago when the Spaniards were searching for gold in Central America and Mexico they found traces of this old civilization, but the accounts which

Central America and Mexico they found traces of this old civilization, but the accounts which they left of what they had seen are but brief and full of priestly traditions, for the accounts were usually written by the missionaries who tried to interpret all that they found in this land in the light of Bible history.

In a charming valley in the tropics, with high mountains rising on all sides and a river flowing near by, is the buried city of Copan, now being unearthed and brought to light that it may tell us the wonderful story of its history. This work is being done by the Peabody Museum of Harvard College. Copan is like several other buried cities of Yucatan in its general plan, but everything indicates that it was the oldest and most important of the Maya cities. As far back as 1576, a Spanish traveler told of this ruined city and added that the Indians about there seemed to have no traditions concerning it, so that even in the sixteenth century the memory of its glory had passed away.

The valley in which Copan is situated is a level away. The valley in which Copan is situated is a level The valley in which Copan is situated is a level plain about seven miles long by two wide and through the city flows the Copan river. All over the plain are scattered the ruins of the stone houses where dwelt the nobles of the ancient kingdom. Paved streets and an extensive system of canals for sewerage show that the inhabitants of Copan were advanced in the art of city building. In the center of the city, on the bank of the Copan River, stand great mounds of ruins, evidently the temples of the people.

mounds of ruins, evidently the temples of the people.

The largest of these is a pyramid in shape and its four sides face the four cardinal points of the compass; but unlike the Pyramids of Egypt this seems not to have been built as a burying place but simply as an elevation on which to erect the places of worship. Where the river has swept away one side of the pyramid layer after layer of ruins are exposed showing that the temples which are now being unearthed are but the last and most highly developed production of a race who abandoned weloped production of a race who abandoned the old and used it as a foundation for the more advanced. Scientists are thus led to believe this valley of Copan was the center of the Maya civilization and that if the work is allowed to go on far enough the key to this ancient cul-ture will be found there.

In the time of its glory the summit of the pyramid was reached by stairways of the most wonderful dimensions and beautiful workman. pyramid was reached by stairways of the most wonderful dimensions and beautiful workmanship. In 1894 one of these stairways was discovered, covered with the debris of the temple above, which in falling had carried with it the upper part of the stairway itself, but the lower part was found intact, enabling us to form some idea of the grandeur of the scene in the days of its prime. Upon the face of each step are carvings in the hieroglyphs which, if we could read them, would tell us a wonderful history. The stairway is thirty feet wide and ascends to the top of the pyramid 130 feet above. At intervals in the center of the stairs are huge figures in stone, seated upon thrones and attired in elaborate robes, while along the parapets at the sides are other carved figures peering from the mouths of mystic monsters. The whole must have been a most impressive spectacle in the days of the city's splendor. On the summit of this central pyramid (for there are many smaller ones) are temples, not one but many. These are all buildings of great extent and the arched roofs display a thorough knowledge of the use of material as well as decoration. Everything in Copan is decorated. Hardly a stone is found but has its surface covered with figures and representations of strange and mystic designs. The monoliths, great stones standing alone, display this curious marking, and probably hold upon their surface much of the history of the race.

The tombs of an ancient people often tell much of their history and in Copan many tombs have been found closely connected with the houses of the wealthy. The burying cloths and even the skeletons themselves have crumbled away but many flint instruments, ornaments of obsidian and even pearl were found, beside beautiful specimens of pottery which in some cases were painted with figures of men and women and finished with a polish; all these things point to a high state of culture.

The history of Copan is still a closed book. Many years must pass before we can have an idea of the glory of its people. Perhaps never shall man know the secret of its destruction. Whether in the midst of battle its temples were razed and its inhabitants slain, or whether by the mere powerful forces of nature its struct.

Whether in the midst of battle its temples were razed and its inhabitants slain, or whether by the more powerful forces of nature its structures were shaken to the foundations and its people in terror obliged to flee—all this may never be revealed.

Long ere the Spanish of the sixteenth century spread their rule over southern North America, the fame of Copan must have faded, else the ever ambitious missionary or gold hunter would have heard of its glory and the story of its magnificence would have come to us together with the story of its overthrow or its conversion. No such tale, however, has reached us. Copan lived out its days in ignorance of European culture and cruelty. Its people lived and built and died without a knowledge of Spain or Egypt, and to-day we can but begin to read back into its ruins the story of its glory and its mystery. story of its glory and its mystery.

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

HE Christmas dinner table may be made very attractive and much merriment may be and much merriment may be caused by placing a small Christmas tree in the center of the table. The tree should be laden with small gifts, one for each member of the dinner party. Much of the decorative effect is obtained by means of ribbons which may be of any color, although red ribbons caryout the color scheme of the holly berries which are usually in evidence, best of all. A bree, and this ribbon should have one long end of the bow extending to the plate of the recipiribbon should be used to tie each gift to the ree, and this ribbon should have one long end of the bow extending to the plate of the recipient of that particular gift. Thus there will be radiating circle of ribbons reaching from the ree to each plate, and the effect is both novel and charming.

The seat of each guest should be designated by a card at the plate.

The gifts should not be taken from the tree until the dessert has been served, and there is sure to be much guessing with regard to the contents of the various parcels. The wrapping will usually completely hide the nature of the contents, as the smallest article may perhaps look the largest if wrapped in several sheets of tissue paper. These gifts need not be expensive and it is surprising what dainty and really good selections may be made within the limit of a quarter of a dollar each, if one sets out to make such a selection with a degree of care.

There will be no flagging of conversation at a dinner table which is decorated after this fashion, and if the party is a family affair, old and young will be equally interested.

A similar decoration of ribbons is used in connection with a cornucopia arranged as a centerpiece, although in this case the gifts would

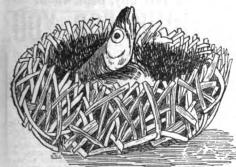

A similar decoration of ribbons is used in connection with a cornucopia arranged as a centerpiece, although in this case the gifts would be hidden from view until drawn. A large doll dressed as Santa Claus should be placed in the center of the table, holding or supporting the cornucopia, and the gifts should be tied with ribbons leading to the plates, as described for the tree. The cornucopia may be as large or as small as required for the number of gifts, and may be made from heavy paper and decorated.

A FAMOUS CHRISTMAS PUNCE.

A FAMOUS CHRISTMAS PUNCH. One bottle raspberries, in liqueur. One bottle strawberries, in liqueur. One bottle cherries, brandied. Six bottles St. Julien claret. Three bottles good rum. Three dozen oranges.

Three dozen oranges.
Three dozen lemons.
One pound of sugar.
Four quart siphons of seltzer.
Cut two oranges and one lemon into small cubes and extract the juice from the remainder.
These cubes are to float in the punch bowl with the cherries, strawberries and raspberries.
Add sugar and when dissolved add claret and rum and last of all the seltzer. This recipe will serve a large number of guests, but it is easily divided so as to make a smaller quantity if desired.

We have been requested to give recipes for frying oysters and smelts, and our illustrations show some of the forms in which the latter may be fried and served.

JULIENNE POTATO NEST.

The potato nest is made of finely shredded raw potatoes which are called Julienne potatoes. For Julienne potatoes the potatoes should be cut and left standing in cold water for two hours before frying; they are then drained, dried between towels and fried in hot, deep fat, in a wire basket. To make the potato nest, place some of the finely shredded potato, after it has been dried between towels, into a four inch fine wire strainer, simply lining it. Then inch fine wire strainer set a three inch strainer of the same shape; this will keep the potatoes in shape while they are frying, which takes only a minute. Set the two strainers into the wire frying basket and carefully lower into the hot fat. When nicely browned remove from strainers and the potatoes will be shaped exactly like the small strainer, or like a nest. Repeat the operation until as many nests have been made as there are people to serve.

If a luncheon is to given, the nests could be made the day before and simply put into the oven for a moment before serving, and so lessen some of the work of the day on which the lunch is to be served.

Nests of this kind might, he used for fried The potato nest is made of finely shredded lunch is to be served.

Nests of this kind might be used for fried smelts, scallops, or for creamed chicken, though if anything is served which has a sauce, or is moist, there is a chance of the potatoes becoming soft and so losing their shape. It is better to serve something dry in them, and then to have a tartar sauce served in an individual dish to each guest.

FRIED OYSTERS.

Parboil large oysters by placing them in an enamelled saucepan and letting them simmer on the top of the stove until the edges begin to curl. Drain and dry between the folds of a towel. Season with salt and pepper and dip in flour, then in egg and then in fine, dry bread crumbs. Place six oysters in a wire frying basket and fry one minute in hot deep fat. Drain on brown paper and serve on a folded napkin, or upon one of the fancy lace paper circles, that can be bought for thirty cents a dozen. Garnish with parsley and lemon fans. In order to know whether or not the fat is of the right temperature, test it with a piece of bread from the inside of the loaf. Put the piece in and count forty, (which will take about one-half of a minute) and if the bread is then of the right color, the fat is of the right temperature; if too brown let the fat cool a little.

FRIED SMELTS.

Bone smelts by cutting a slit the entire length of under side, laying the fish open. With a sharp knife remove back bone. Start with tail, and roll the fish up toward the head. When the head is reached let it lie on top of the roll and with small wooden tooth picks skewer, so that the roll will stay in shape. This looks like a lady's muff, with the openings on either side and head on top. Dip in crumbs, egg and crumbs again. Place in basket and fry in hot fat about four minutes. The flesh is rolled up into so many blicknesses that it is necessary to cook it at least four minutes in order to be sure it is thoroughly cooked. Then place one smelt into each potato basket, allowing the head to stand up in center.

Other ways of serving smelts are to skewer them into various shapes (after they have been boned) so that they keep their natural shape. Open the mouth and twist the tail around to go into it, and skewer to keep there. Or twist into it, and skewer to keep there. Or twist them to look as though they were moving. After being fried the skewers must be carefully

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ECENTLY it was the ECENTLY it was the writer's good fortune to secure a pass admitting him to the premises of the New England Gas and Coke Company, doing business at Everett, Massachusetts. The details of a morning's trip tails of a morning's trip through the plant will prove interesting and in-prove interesting and instructive to the readers of COMFORT.

Near the entrance to the works I was accosted by an employee of the Company who demanded my business. Showing my pass which was obtained at the Boston office, I was immediately escorted to one of the offices on the grounds. There a guide was detailed to show me through the plant and one of the most interesting trips which I have had the pleasure of making, began.

me through the plant and one of the most interesting trips which I have had the pleasure of making, began.

"Here is the first of eight batteries of coke ovens," said the guide, indicating a long tier of brick ovens; "there are fifty in each battery, making a total of four hundred ovens each holding six tons of coal.

"This is a soft coal, known as Dominion Slack, coming from Nova Scotia," said Mr. Williams, my guide, pointing to a carload which was at hand, "a fine coal, little of it larger than a walnut, much nothing but dust. It is raised from the wharf yonder by means of an elevator and the cars of the dummy railroad which leads directly to the ovens are loaded. One of the cars stopping just above an empty oven, the top of the latter is removed and the six tons of coal deposited within it. This oven is now closed and sealed so that there is no chance for the air to reach the interior, thus preventing combustion."

Mr. Williams led the way to the end of the battery, mounted a step and removed a small plug from the brick wall.

"I suppose you have wondered how these ovens were heated?" he said, stepping to one side, "well, here is the heat stored ready for use; look through this opening, but do not get too close."

I did as bidden and started back in amaze-

I did as bidden and started back in amazement. Within was a long chamber, perhaps one hundred feet long, three feet wide and ten feet high: this seemed one lurid mass of fire, though there was absolutely no blaze—gas heated to a temperature above anything I had ever imagined, a fiend of destruction awaiting the moment when it should leap forth. "Here is the gas in use," said the guide, removing another plug on the other side of the battery, "you will see something different here."

Mithin I saw the gas burning, great waves of flame sweeping backward and forward, air having been admitted, producing combustion, a veritable volcano of fire.

"This heat attacks the oven from all sides," said the guide, "and during the first ten hours the gas escapes into the large pipe that carries the gas to the cooling tanks. At the same time and during the ensuing twenty hours tar and other products come away from the coal in the oven."

A short distance away workmen were busily engaged clearing the sealing preparation from one of the oven doors, and the guide suggested that we approach and obtain a better view of the work.

that we approach and obtain a better view of the work.

"They are about to open that oven," said he, "watch closely and you will see the coke as it begins to catch fire upon coming in contact with the air."

I looked, and presently the door was slowly raised and the coke at a white heat began to move forward, pushed through the door by a powerful engine at the rear door. At the same time the mass began to blaze as the wind fanned the glowing coals, but a stream of water was directed upon it as it rolled out into an iron car, called a discharging Larry, and there was an end to the action of fire on the coke, as far as the Company was concerned.

Mr. Williams said that the amount of coke yielded by one oven containing six tons of coal, was four and eighty-seven hundredths tons.

From the batteries we went to the building where the coolers and purifying tanks were

"The gas enters the first cooler at a temperature of about one hundred and eighty degrees," said my accommodating friend, "and having passed through coils of pipe surrounded by water, enters a similar one where it is still further cooled. This is called a scrubber," he continued, pointing to another tank, "here the gas is forced through water and thoroughly stirred up, freeing much of the tar and oils which have clung to the gas; having passed through these scrubbers, it enters another set of coolers and is reduced to a still lower temperature, and from these to the bell-washers—the final cleansers of the gas.

perature, and from these to the bell-washers—
the final cleansers of the gas.

Near one of the bell-washers he lifted a glass globe and I saw the "gas liquor," as he called it—the water through which the gas had passed, boiling up through a pipe, globules of oil and tar being plainly visible.

The "gas liquor" having passed from the different coolers and washers, is hurried forward to another building where numerous tanks, smaller than those in the first building, are filled. Already has most of the tar separated from the "gas liquor" and the principal product remaining—the only one that the Company deems it profitable to abstract, is ammonia sulphate. With the addition of chemicals a prespiritation occurs and the "gas liquor".

monia sulphate. With the addition of chemicals a precipitation occurs and the "gas liquor" having been drawn off, a heavy deposit of ammonia sulphate is found.

"I note that this coke is used largely on certain railroads," I said; "do they find it a more economical fuel than coal?"

"Certainly no more costly," was the reply, "and far cleaner, no smoke, to speak of, and few cinders, besides producing a hotter fire. The coke is not only used largely in these parts, but shipments have been and are being made to Mexico and other distant places."

"Is the ammonia obtained from coal equal to that secured from other sources?" I asked.

"Not only equal to, but superior," was the reply.

reply.
"And the tar is converted into several forms," diameter, two hundred and thirty-four feet high, or several feet higher than Bunker Hill Monument, and containing five million cubic feet of gas. It proved a tiresome journey and savoring of adventure as we ascended, but thoroughly enjoyable, nevertheless, at least to myself, and the view from the highest platform was magnificent, well worth the exertion—a fit ending of the morning's trip.

The Brave Deed of Young Paul Kruger.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

TEPHANUS Jo-hannes Paulus Kru-ger, Oom Paul, The Lion of Ruslenberg, President Kruger, by whatever name you call him, was as remarkable as a boy as he now is as a man. He was born and bred a fighter. His father was one of the famous lion bunters of South lion hunters of South Africa, and from in-fancy to manhood his life was an almost con-stant struggle with wild beasts and the yet wilder black men of South Africa. He shot his first big game when only seven years old, killed his first lion when but eleven, and before he had reached the years of manhood he had slain more lions then any more lions than any man in the colon y.

COMFORT.

While yet a boy, he stood at his father's side when he fired his first shot at English soldiers; and he had won distinction as a soldier against and he had won distinction as a soldier against the English and the black men before he was out of his teens. He was absolutely without fear, and could endure without flinching the most excruciating bodily pain. One day, while hunting rhinoceros, the old gun he carried exploded and hurt one of his thumbs so severely as to render it useless. Young Kruger, without making any ado over the matter, laid his hand down on a log, and cut the torn thumb off with a dull knife. There are many other stories told, illustrating his youthful daring and prowess, but the one that goes direct to the heart because of the heroic courage and chivalry of the deed, is the one that tells how, at the risk of his own life, he saved the life of his sister.

This is the story: He and a younger sister were slowly jogging along in an old ox cart over the veidt, when, suddenly, a South African panther sprang at the ox that was drawing them. The panther missed the ox and the frightened animal made so sudden a jump that the little girl was thrown out of the cart. A glance showed Paul the peril of his sister. She was at the mercy of the hungry panther. Already the beast was preparing to spring upon her. The boy had no weapon save a small knife, yet, without an instant's hesitation, this heroic brother threw himself out of the safety of the cart, and, drawing the knife, rushed between his sister and the panther. There was no other help near. If he failed to kill the panther, the panther would kill them both. But Paul Kruger, although only a boy of fourteen, was nearly as strong as a man, and not even the gleaming teeth and long claws of the panther could daunt his courage. With a low growl the hungry beast sprang at the boy. If he only had his rifle! But there was only the panther could daunt his courage. With a low growl the hungry beast sprang at the boy. If he only had his rifle! But there was only the blade of his knife between him and the on-comblade of his knife between him and the on-coming panther. The struggle that followed was a terrible one. It seemed as if the fierce beast must kill the lad, but, at last, the indomitable courage and wonderful strength of the boy prevailed, the knife struck a vital spot, and the panther was dead. Young Kruger was sorely injured and completely exhausted, but he had saved his sister from a frightful death.

The boy Paul Kruger has become one of the world's famous men; but in all his remarkable

A Lady Reader Writes How She Made Money to Build a Home.

Money to Build a Home.

"I often read of ladies who work hard trying to earn enough to keep body and soul together and for their benefit I will relate how easily one can get along in the world if they only know how. I had tried flavoring powders myself and knew they were splendid, so sent for a free sample and tried selling them. I found it so pleasant and easy that I have kept right at it and never make less than $3 a day and often clear more than $5. The powders go twice as far as the liquid extracts sold in stores and are much stronger. I sell from one to eight different flavors in each house. They are used for ice cream, custards, cakes, candies, etc. and are so delicate and give such a rich flavor that everywhere I go I gain a permanent customer. Those of you who would like to make money can get full particulars by writing to Baird Mfg. Co., 348 Baird Bidg. Pittsburg, Pa., and they will give you a good start. I support myself and family nicely, am building a good home out of the proceeds of my sales and have a good many comforts we never had before."

"M. B."

When I say I cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Post Office.

30 DAYS TRIAL FREE

Marvelous Nerve Force Imparted by a New an Startling Discovery--- Every Weak, Nervous or Enfeebled Man Should Give It a Test.

Will Be Sent Free on Thirty Days Trial so All May Experience the Was derful Sensation of Restored Vigor--- Without Cost.

PROF. A. CHRYSTAL.

A well known professor has made the fortunate discovery that what has heretofore been known as impotency or lost manhood is due to paralysis of the nerves. As it requires a vigorous condition of the nerves to control the muscles, the professor has found a wonderful power that instantly awakens the nerves and thus restores complete muscular strength. He says:—The marvelous power exerted by recent additions and improvements to my electric belt and appliances induces me to send it on 30 days free trial, so certain am I that it will cure and that the wearer will gladly pay the small price asked after the 30 days trial.

To men who have battered their stomachs with drugs I want them to exercise their judgment and consider that electricity is the greatest power on earth. Its unseen current puts life and force into whatever it touches. The constant, steady life extended by my new Electric Appliances gives instant relief and never fails to cure Rheumatism, Backache, Kidney troubles, Early Decay, Night Losses, Lack of Nerve Force and Vigor, Nervous Debility, Undevelopment and Lost Vitality. You may not have faith in it now, but wear it for 30 days and you will then realize why I have such confidence in it as to send it to you on trial.

I receive the most wonderful testimonials day after day. Rev. S. B. Stephens of Derry Station, Westmoreland Co., Pa., says it cured him of a rible disease, and had deprived him of happins His nerves were in a bad condition of western but in three days after putting on the betan pensory he felt wonderfully improved and now the full strength and vigor of every membered body.

Geo. R. Makley of Oneonta, N. Y., states the ter trying everything he could find without benefit, he tried one of my belts and applia and was cured of varicocele, general debility, lack of nerve force and vigor. He gained pounds in 35 days and would not take hundred dollars for the belt if he could not another.

FASHION WORLD, P. O. Box 3050, New York City, Dept. 43 D.

Well, dears, did you all have a good time Thanksgiving, and have plenty of turkey and good things? Did you? That's nice. And you ought to be thankful, for lots of people in this big country of ours didn't have. Now comes Christmas and may it be a very merry one to you all. one to you all.

With these few words of good will and cheer, let us get to your letters, and the first one in the pile is from Brown Eyes, Baltimore, Md., who wants to know if it is right to offer a gentleman refreshments when he calls. Certainly it is, and every man likes that kind of hospitality. She asks also about asking some people to visit her, who have been nice to her, but who are much better fixed than she is. Ask them by all means. It isn't what you give people that makes them think most of you, but the manner of your giving. Write a note to the young lady thanking her, and in it ask her to visit you.

Three Girls, Townsville, Texas.—It is quite proper for young people to exchange locks of hair, but it is very old fashioned, and very silly. (2) Yes, tell the young man he is good looking in return for his saying as much for you. (3) A lady railroad agent may carry on a conversation with a strange business man, but it should be very formal, until she has seen him enough to know who he is. (4) Give it up. Nobody knows what Love is. It ought to be a condition rather than a sensation, though I don't know whether it is or not.

Daffodil, Union City, Ind.—Choose for yourself what you think would be a nice Christmas present for the "dear" young man. (2) I don't think if I were you I would wear the young man's photograph on a button.

Hayflower, Pineville, Ky.—A young man that can "pop" and won't "pop" ought to be made to "pop," and if you can talk half as well as you can write, you ought to be able to bring him to his senses easily enough. Lilybell, Ayr, Ind.—I think you will do better as a happy married woman than as a school teacher. You know a school teacher shouldn't spell "ambitious" "ambicious."

Virginia Olyve, San Francisco, Cal.—Whether you get the young man of your choice or not, do not marry the man you do not love, even though you do love your parents dearly and they want to wreck your life for the money the man has.

Eva Claire, Neinart, Mon.—It seems to be customary for young men to take ladies home from church though they have not taken them there. I guess it is all right. X. Y. Z., Chicago, Ills.—As I understand it, the authorities of the Catholic Church are the ones to say how the forms of marriage are to be carried out. Ask a priest about it.

Lillian, Houston, Texas.—I do not know anything about the Texas school laws. Before you try to become a teacher, it will be well for you to learn them there.

Percilla, Solomonsville, Ariz.—It would be quite impossible to suggest a way to a practical education as you seek it. You must consult a teacher in your own town. (3) Don't marry a man younger than yourself. (4) Whether a person with a weak heart from inflammatory rheumatism should marry or not is a question for the doctors to settle.

Pansy, Whitewater, Wis.—Don't marry anybody unless you want to, and not always then. It's a queer mother who wants her daughter to marry a drunkard.

Amelia, Medicine Lodge, Kans.—The young man should give you another ring for the one he has lost. (2) No.

Brown Eyes, Mt. Vernon, Mo.—In my judgment not only "from a mental and moral standpoint", but from a legal point of view in most states, the marriage of cousins is wrong. Don't do it.

NEW ZEALAND.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ORE than half way around the world from us lies New Zealand, one of the least known of England's large one of the least known of England's large colonies. It is a group of islands, two large and many small ones and its area is about equal to that of Great Britain.

The islands were found to be excellent for the production of flax and gum and its forests were rich in useful timber. At length England was convinced that if she wished to have any influence in this far southern land she England was convinced that it she wished to have any influence in this far southern land she must proclaim sovereignty over the islands. This she did, completing her arrangement only a few weeks before the French were ready to do the same. What would have been the history of New Zealand had England delayed, it were hard to determine. hard to determine. England made an excellent treaty with the native Maoris, in which she guaranteed them the undisturbed possession of their lands, together with their ancient rights and their freedom, in return for which the native chiefs gave up their rights of sovereignty. This treaty has been held inviolate by both parties, and no land has ever been acquired from the natives except by purchase. Much of the land is rented to Englishmen by the natives, and we find many small farms and holdings, but no vast estates as in other English colonies. The native chiefs are allowed to sit in the Council and representatives are sent to the colonial House of Parliament. England may well feel herself repaid for her treatment of the Maoris, for they have shown themselves an intelligent and industrious people, accepting the improvements of civilization and proving themselves valuable citizens.

South Island is skirted, along its western coast, by a grand mountain range rising 12,000 feet above the sea which is a fair rival to the Alps in its beauty of scenery. Magnificent forests cover the sides of these mountains, and to the east the land slopes off in rolling plains, unrivalled in all the world for fertility.

Separated from South Island by a strait fiteen or twenty miles wide, is the North Island, which though smaller, is the more important island. Nearly every part is well fitted for habitation, for no high mountains interrupt its surface and the climate is mild and agreeable.

The central part of this island is one of the most wonderful volcanic districts in the world. In a narrow strip not more than seventy-five miles wide are contained geysers, hot springs, pools of boiling mud, sulphur waters, and nearly every other kind of spring known to have curative properties. There are two active volcances in the district, Tongariro and Ruapehu. These rise to a height equal to some of our Rocky Mountain peaks. Their eruptions, though frequent are not severe, and instead of lava, clouds of steam and gallons of boiling water ar

This district is thickly inhabited by the Maoris and they understand perfectly the curative properties of the waters, so that many of them earn an excellent livelihood by giving medical advice to the many invalids who go there for treatment.

They assure these visitors that their waters contain a cure for any ill and surely they themselves are a good illustration of the excellent effect of their treatment, for they are a healthy, rugged race. The New Zealand hot springs are becoming noted even in Europe for their wonderful effect upon rheumatic troubles, and this volcanic district seems likely to beand this volcanic district seems likely to be-come as noted a health resort as Saratoga. Happy New Zealand, fortunate for her that she lies so far away from the great centers of the world, that a month or more must elapse in reaching her. Western town there lives a man who lacks even the rudiments of an education, He was a miner—a laborer; but a few years ago he found a vein of ore which he sold for a small amount, and then established himself in a small way in the mercantile business. At first he kept no books, trusting entirely to his memory for a record of his transactions; but a railroad was recently built into his town, and his business increased to such an extent that he found himself compelled to employ a book-keeper.

The book-keeper, at the end of his first day's work, emptied the cash-drawers, entered the amount in his books and then locked cash and books in the safe. The next morning he was surprised to find that ten dollars were missing. In no way could he account for the shortage, other than to suppose that his employer had taken the money out during the night. To make sure he went into the store to speak with him about it.

"When you take money from the safe, Mr. Blank," he said, "you should tell me of it, or leave a note stating the amount so that I can enter it in the books."

out of the safe?" his employer asked, suspiciously.
"Why, the books tell me that you took out ten dollars last night."
"They do, eh!" snorted the employer.
"Well, young man, you just march back into the office and throw them blamed books in the fire. Next thing I know they'll be tellin' you what I did with that ten dollars, and that's nobody's business but mine."

N Norwegian Mines a singular custom prevails in paying the weekly wages of the men. They present themselves on Saturday evening to the inspector, who, having settled accounts with each, bids him turn round, and writes in white chalk, upon his back, the sum due him. Thus numbered, the man goes to the cashier, who also turns him around to look at the figures, and pays him without a word.

LOVES are mentioned as far back as Homer's time. They have been used by almost all civilized nations from that time to this, and have been by many considered of great importance in matters of etiquette. They have been used as a pledge of importance in matters of etiquette. They have been used as a pledge of contracts—as a challenge, and even a lady's pledge of favor when presented by her to her chivalrous knight, and worn by him in his helmet. They have been made of almost every conceivable material, but in modern times the greatest proportion are manufactured from buckskin and kid. In the manufacture of the latter, the French excel, and in buckskin the Americans produce the best. It is estimated that the French use annually in the manufacture of gloves 4,500,000 skins. ture of gloves 4,500,000 skins.

AN ASTHMA CURE AT LAST.

It gives us great pleasure to announce the discovery of a positive cure for Asthma, in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanic product found on the Congo River, West Africa. The cures wrought by it in the worst cases, are really marvelous. Sufferers of twenty to fifty years' standing have been at once restored to health by the Kola Plant. Among others many ministers of the gospel testify to its wonderful powers. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., was perhaps the worst case, and was cured by the Kola Plant after fifty years suffering. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, Washington, D. C., Editor of the Farmers' Magazine, gives similar testimony as do many others. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power the Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of Comfort, who suffers from any form of Asthma. They only ask in return that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. You should surely try it, as it costs you nothing.

If you suffer from Epilepsy, Fits, Falling Sickrelatives, friends or neighbors that do so, or know people that are afflicted, my New Treatment will immediately relieve and PERMANENTLY CURE them, and all you are asked to do is to send for my FREE TREATMENT and try it. PROF. JULES LABORDE, DISCOVERER OF "CALTHOS." For years the cry has gone up from hundreds and thousands of men, young and old, for a remedy that would rid them of the terrible result of early follies or excesses, or of the overwork and worry that sap the physical vitality.

The medical profession of this country seemed powerless to cope with the appalling and disastrous diseases and annoying weaknesses of men resulting from violation of Nature's laws.

PROF. LABORDE'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

PROF. LABORDE'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

It remained for the eminent French authority, Prof. Jules Laborde, to conduct scientific inquiry into the cause and cure of Lost Vitality, Sexual Weakness, Spermatorrhea, Epilepsy, Impotency, Small Parts, and the world today acknowledges the supremacy of the wonderful remedy "CALTHOS."

The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, recognizing the commercial value of Prof. Laborde's discovery, secured the sole American rights for "CALTHOS." and through its agency thousands of men who suffered from sexual diseases and enfeebling nervous maladies have been restored to health and the virile powers of perfect manhood.

of men who suffered from sexual diseases and enfeebling nervous maladies have been restored to health and the virile powers of perfect manhood.

THE VON MOHL GO'S. REMARKABLE OFFER.
We are now authorized, by The Von Mohl Company, to announce that every man who sends simply his name and address will be supplied absolutely free by sealed mail, with five-days full treatment of "CALTHOS." This is no C. O. D. or Deposit Scheme, and there is positively no condition attached to the offer. You need not spid details regarding your trouble. You need not spid details regarding your trouble. You need not spid details regarding your trouble. You need not spid one cent of money—not even a postage stamp. All

The Von Mohl Company for the five-days free treatment write that they are entirely cured.

For the sake of your family and friends, as well as for your own best interests, write to The Von Mohl Company for the free treatment by mail, in plain sealed package, at once.

The Von Mohl Company desires is that you give the remedy a fair and thorough trial, and they are willing to stand all the expense connected with the trial to prove the faith in its merits.

POWER OF "CALTHOS" PROVED.

The first day you take the treatment you will be benefited. The second day you will feel an improvement. The third day you will note an increase of strength. The fourth day will show a gain both mentally and physically. The fifth day you will feel like a new man. If you suffer from any form of Nervous Decline and Sexual Weakness, Spermatorrhea, Varicocele, Impotency, Small Parts, Night Sweats, Palpitation of the Heart, Nervousness, Confusion of Ideas, and Loss of Memory, you can positively be cured by "CALTHOS," but if the disease has progressed to the stage marked by the symptoms of Epilepsy, Consumption or Insanity, we cannot promise complete recovery.

A NINE YEARS' TEST.

GALENA, ILLINOIS, Oct. LIGHT, ACCORDING TO THE GIANT CO., AUGUSTA, MAINE.
GENTLEMEN: Do you realize I have been selling your remedies for the past nine years? After acting thus as your agent for this long period it is not flattery when I say to you that no business house exists that can suppass, your own in honesty and fair dealings—even more, generosity to its patrons. Not one jar or the slightest cause for complaint is surely evidence beyond question in ynine years' dealings with you. May you live long to enjoy the good you are doing is the wish of Yours truly,

FANNIE AUBUCHON.

THE GIANT OO. MUNCE, INDIANA, Oct. 10th, 1900.

GENTLEMEN: After ten years of successful work for year of currenality say that you have more than done as you agreed during my long period of selling your fainous Oxien Remedies. There has nothing taken away the Joy that came to me from getting my first box of Oxien. As for Prenium I have received so many and such nice ones, too, that I cannot possibly enumerate them. They were all fine and perfectly satisfactory. I consider your firm one of the best in existence and although I have had many flattering offers to work for other concerns, I have always been true to The Giant Oxien Co., for they have been honest and faithful in carrying out their promises to me. Wishing you continued prosperty, I remain, Yours truly, EMMA E. BRANSON.

HE Astrological figure for the Lunation which occurs in the evening of the 21st of our deductions for the beginning weeks of the New which is the basis of our deductions for the beginning weeks of the New Year, shows the last degrees of Cancer r is in g. with the middle degrees of Arics culminating. All the planets are below the horizon near the cusp of the 12th house. The luminaries come together in the 6th house just between Jupiter and Saturn and nearly opposed to Neptune; Herschel is close to Mercury in the 5th house where also Venus is found; and Mars is on the cusp of the 3rd house near the square of Mercury and Herschel, but favorably aspecting the luminaries and Saturn.

The Sun and Moon are leaving the benefic Jupiter and approaching Saturn, indicative of more than the average sickness among the people, especially the poorer classes, during the first three or four weeks of the year. Particular caution is suggested for the troubles peculiar to the respiratory organs. Coughs and colds will be unusually prevalent and the stomach will be easily disordered. The season prompts more than usual care as to temperance, for unwise indulgencies in stimulants will be attended with greater mischief than usual. Surgery will become an important factor in these days in remedying existing evils. It is apprehended that there will be an increase of suffering among the poorer classes from exposure to cold and inclement measons and the benevolently disposed will have unusual opportunities to assist their less fortunate brethren. Malefic combinations in the 5th caution those in charge of schools against fires and violent excitement among pupis and may cause the closing of schools in some sections for avoidance of eruptive diseases. Some unusual excitement is likely in administration of school matters or the misdeeds of some in charge of schools. Fire threatens mischief to government buildings and those in charge should be constantly vigilant.

Some differences arise in international matters over unusual action of nations believed to be friendly. Canadian matters engage renewed diplomatic efforts. In most other respects the promises of the figure do not de

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JANUARY, 1901.

JANUARY. 1—Tuesday. The very early hours of the day are the poorest but as the day advances conditions are much improved. It does not mend enough, however, to invite much merry making. Gratification and pleasaure seeking are more likely to be attended with unpleasant consequences unless the greatest moderation be exercised. Association for purposes of business not concerned with the elegant or artistic in life will have best chances for satisfactory results; do not take the time for any matrimonial engagement, especially if born about the 2d of March, 4th of June. 5th of September, or the 6th of December, of past years. Persons in the musical, dramatic and artistic pursuits generally, born at the times indicated, are in adverse circumstances at about this time or have more than the usual embarrassment in their undertakings in these passing days, nor should they now enter into any important venture in life.

2—Wednesday. Adverse conditions rule this day as well as yesterday for the persons and business ventures therein indicated; do not expect satisfactory results in any of the nice engagements. Some very unfortunate marriages will occur at this time and it is peculiarly fruitful in producing elopenients among the wayward. Have no business engagements with persons in government office or with large corporations. Dramatic matters are under a cloud and managers in such walks have strange trials.

3—Thursday. Hold the purse strings securely on this day, nor make any purchase of merchandise for trade; sign no written obligation concerning money, nor apply for favor to persons in high stations in life, nor to banks or monied institutions of any kind; make no engagements with persons in the literary callings, with contractors, builders, excavators or mining officers or employees.

4—Friday. Mixed conditions prevail, more suited for engagements with persons in the mechanical callings than others, provided the mid-day hours be employed; give no cause for offense in thy dealings with persons in authority; avoid thy landlord and do not be disappointed if baffled in the majority of thine efforts for the day.

ed it bassed in the majority of thine efforts for the day.

5—Saturday. Fair success will be met in the general transactions of the day, but it is not a good time for commencing any undertaking of magnitude; the time is more likely to be cold, cheeriess and apathetic and does not conduce to happy conclusions.

6-Sunday. Essentially a day for rest.

6-Nunday. Essentially a day for rest.

7-Monday. This week begins more auspiciously.
Choose the day for urging the elegant pursuits; push business vigorously but give the preference to dealings in fancy goods, dress materials, jewelry and furnishings, all in the forenoon; sign no deeds in the forenoon nor look for creditable results from mental efforts.

R—Tuesday. The morning hours should be given the preference for all engagements with banks and persons of wealth and refinement, also for purchase of goods for trade; ask no favor from thine employer during the middle hours, but as the afternoon advances let all engagements pertaining to houses and lands be pushed to the utnost; mental efforts in the evening and night hours will be fruitful of good to all persons except those born about the 29th of March, 30th of June, its of October or 30th of December, of past years. The latter persons have more than usual annoyance just now in matters of writing or account or are adversely affected in the nerwous system. Many of them are troubled with neuralgic pains or the nervous forces show impairment.

9—Wedmesday. Avoid contention and disputes during the first two-thirds of this day; have no surgical operation performed, especially about the abdomen or bowels and seek no favor from military men or government officers.

10—Thursday. Those who speculate with their money on this day need not expect much profit but are more likely to meet losses; do not buy goods for trade nor seck favors from banks or monied men; beware of purchases for mere gratification as the impulse will be towards extravagemee.

Author extravarance.

11—Friday. Improve the early and late hours of this day for the major affairs of the time but have unusual eare from 11 o'clock until 2 in the day when routine matters only should have attention; baffling conditions prevail in the noon hours when no business connected with houses or lands should be transacted.

18 Saturday. Again the noon hours are the poorest when no favor should be expected from persons in authority; the early forenoon and the afternoon should have thy best efforts.

14-Menday. Begin the day early; do correspond-ence and urge all manner of business with vigor; deal with booksellers, publishers, stationers and all engaged in the intellectual paraults; deal in machinery, chemicals, drugs, tools and combustibles; take initiatory steps and urge proceedings in integation. The time is more fortunate than usual for persons born about the 3rd of January, May, or July or the 5th of November of past years, as such persons are likely to be now full of hope and encouragement at the condition of their affairs; and have new ventures or improved opportunities now offering which promise well for them. On the other hand persons born about the 4th of March, 3rd of June, or the 6th of September or December, of past years, are more likely to be in the midst of some unusual excitement or controversy or have insidious attacks upon the health, particularly as relates to the respiratory organs and liver and bowels. Such persons should exercise greatest care at this time for avoidance of coughs and colds and should study patience and forbearance in their dealings with mankind; being careful not to be overhasty in sotion, overbearing in deportment nor intolerant of control in their walks in life, in these passing weeks, as there is danger that business associations may be foolishly severed under temporary excitement.

15—Tuesday. Crowd all affairs to the utmost of this day, especially such as require dealings with officials or persons in authority.

16—Wednesday. Literary ventures are somewhat detrimented during this forenoon, but the noon hours are favorable for general affairs. The evening invites caution against disputes and controversies. Fires in government buildings are to be looked out for and explosions and accidents from machinery and on railways threaten at this time.

17—Thurwisty. The day is indifferent until the afternoon when conditions prevail more than ordinarily crowd all general matters the harder as the day advances.

18—Friday. Begin early and improve every moment in the pursuit of art, music, and in the elegant avocations generally; deal in fancy goods and engage in business pertaining to decoration, adornment, furnishings and dramatic goods or entertainments; buy goods for trade in the early hours of the day and have money transactions of consequence, all during the forenoon; the afternoon is less to be depended upon and is likely to arrest progress in matters in hand or buffle results in things then newly begun.

19-Naturday. Be early astir for urging the mechanical and chemical pursuits and for dealings in metals, machinery, horses and cattle; consuit thy dentist and travel travel.

20—Sunday. This day is unusually benevolent, particulary inviting communion with the poet and literati; the mental faculties will be remarkably quickened and appreciation of literary productions quite noticeable.

21—Monday. Choose this day for removal, travel, dealing with public officers and large corporations.

22—Tuesday. This is the merchant's own day and an especially fortunate one for every honorable pursuit; buy goods for trade, speculate in securities, if thy nativity likewise favor, and seek money accommodations; make collections and deal with banks.

23—Wedm mday. A day of increased mental excite.

23-Wedn aday. A day of increased mental excitement; the mind is likely to be rash; keep a civil tongue; be slow to tale offense and be careful in handling fire, steam, chemicals, and the brute creation at large.

steam, chemicals, and the brute creation at large.

24.—Thursday. Look out for the pennies on this day, for conditions invite money shrinkages and losses or extravagant expenditures; do not buy stock in trade.

25.—Friday. The early and late hours are the best; the middle hours being peculiarly inimical for any dealings concerning lands, mines, agricultural products, house-furnishings, and all decorative artistic goods; do not depend upon the day for any musical effort or for painting or any dramatic or social undertaking; adverse for courtship or marriage and threatening to harmony among artists; the evening gives improvement.

26.—Saturday. The forenoon should be given pref-

26—Naturday. The forenoon should be given preference for business enterprises of consequence; the afternoon is mischievous and the evening is superior, when favor may be sought from persons of wealth and on one expect muon satisfaction from dramatic, musical or social entertainments in the evening.

27—Sunday. The influences in the first part of this day contribute vitality, strength and buoyancy of spirit in an unusual degree: inclining more to activity than rest; pulpit efforts are likely to be energetic and aggressive rather than sound or logical; the afternoon gives unusual appreciation of the beautiful in life.

29—Tuesedmy. Seek favor from thine employer in the early morning; do not deal with mechanics or manufacturers in the afternoon; but press all mental efforts and literary work or engagements in the evening, when also give attention to accounts, mathematical work and scientific studies.

30—Wednesdmy. Use the forenoon for commercial undertakings not concerned with patented goods or trade marks; do not seek any advancement in thine employment nor expect favor from thy superior.

31—Thurndmy. Give preference to this day for the pursuit of the ingenious and mechanical trades and for dealings with glass-workers, iron and brass founders, bakers, butchers, military men, chemists, druggiste, and the manufacturing interests; have no money transactions in the early forenoon when money losses are more likely; do not concern thyself about real estate or mining interests in the late hours of the day.

The lands where "the dawn comes up like thunder out o' China 'cross the bay" do not seem so far away since the "Eastern question" began to be important to Americans. The Ameer of Afghanistan has written his autobiography with a frankness and detail that seem amazing to Westerners. This selfants with him from the time he wakes until he sleeps. In a room near him are professional chess players, a story teller and a reader of books, with a few personal companions, all and each ready to be summoned to amuse his royal highness. The Ameer is progressive and anxious for the welfare of his people but confesses that the constant petty quarrels and intrigues of the court make him long for a quiet existence. His highness seems to be afflicted with the American hurry for he complains that his life is a constant round of work and that he is so busy that he has to ask his courtiers whether or no he has eaten his dinner. He retires at five or six in the morning and rises at two in the afternoon. The intervening time is not unbroken rest for the Ameer complains that he wakes every hour to worry over his country. The most casual reader of the autobiography must be impressed by the naive delight which the monarch shows in the fact that he leads a strenuous life. He gravely asserts that none of his countrymen have one tenth of his work to do. To read his detail of daily duty is a liberal education to anyone who imagines that the life of an Eastern ruler is one long luxurious revel. The Ameer states that in 1891 he delegated the public receptions to his son and left for himself these daily duties: foreign office, intelligence department, political work, treasury, criminals accused of high treason, appeals from the courts, making new courts, amending the law of the land and introducing reforms, buying material for the workshops, and regulating the household affairs of his own harem and also of his entire court. The Ameer's wives, children and grandchildren are granted a liberal allowance from the English Government. Their dresses which the Ameer states "are many and of both Oriental and European style" are not paid for from this allowance. Religious toleration prevails in the land. The Ameer is a Sunni Muslim, but many of the highest office holders are Hindoos and Shias. The court entertainments are simple and the poor Eastern follower of the strenuous life declares that even there he is working all the time. In the evenings he watches the professional chess and backgammon players, or listens occasionally to music. He declares that he loves music and can himself play the violin and rubab while the best pianos, guitars, bagpipes and other musical instruments are to be found in the palace. All in all the Ameer is a most entertaining writer for his frank and innocent egotism spares no little personal item of daily life.

Mark Twain has returned to America after a five years' lecturing tour around the world. His manager, Major Pond, offered him $10,000 to deliver ten lectures in America after his return, but Twain refused the offer stating with characteristic humor that talking for money was work and that took the fun out of it. The varied experiences of sixty years have culminated in the honest heroism of the effort that has resulted in the cancelling of $80,000 of indebtedness in four years. When Mark Twain started on his lecturing tour he assumed the entire indebtedness of the publishing firm of C. L. Webster and Co., of which he was a member. He gave his first lecture during the summer of 1895 in Cleveland. Over 3000 people packed the Music Hall of that city to give him welcome and good luck on the jot mey. He began the globe circling ill, depressed, with fortune gone and a burden of indebtedness that would have staggered many a younger man. In Cape Town he stood upon a lecture and its chief charm lies in the constant play of platform for what he stated was the last time. varied expression that accompanies her conver-

York on the Minnehaha which he stated was es in exquisite taste. Her three children are in loaded with his baggage. He will spend the Japan and for the present will not be brought winter in New York. His last books now promise to give him a good income and the most popular of American writers can spend his time in peace and comfort. The story of great coal strike was the woman who became Twain's life has as much of the element of known as Mother Jones. She led the marches romance as any fiction ever written. It is typically American. His boyhood spent as a printer's apprentice in a little Missouri river town, his gradual rise to a river pilot with the familiar cry of "mark twain." Little did he dream that the measuring cry was to be assumed by him as a name, and a name to be famous around the world. Few people ever think of Mr. S. L. Clemens but Mark Twain is a world-known name. His books are read where ever the language is and their writer is welcome alike in the mining camps of the West and the courts of Europe. Those who know him best say that tenderness and sensitiveness are his most prominent traits, but at the same time he has the fierce spirit of retaliation that seems born of the experience of his frontier life.

Sir Thomas Lipton is literally a household word in America for his great tea estates in Ceylon with their product are familiar to many who have little interest in Lipton the vachtsman. The second challenge from him for America's Cup was not unexpected. His gallant attempt to win the precious trophy with the Shamrock was of international as well as sporting interest. He carried home the good wishes of Americans although he failed to "lift the cup." His American admirers presented him with a beautiful gold loving cup but this flattering token of esteem was a fresh encouragement for Sir Thomas to attempt to get the battered silver trophy that America has defended so long. Sir Thomas was born in Glasgow, of Irish parents, as his naming of the Shamrock shows. He began life in a humble way but has risen to an immense fortune which he persists in enjoying alone. He has asked that the races be sailed in August so that expectation and anticipation of a victory for an American yacht have a long time to gather strength.

The Japanese Legation is always a center of interest at the capital. It is an entertaining combination of Oriental magnificence and Eastern hospitality conformed to modern European manners. The ladies of the Legation now wear European dress as all the higher classes in Japan are learning to do. Many amusing incidents develop during the assimilation of American customs The wife of a former Japanese Minister when asked her husband's favorite sport replied, "My husband he like to flirt best of all things in the world. He think this American sport most adorable. We flirt and flirt all the day long. I flirt with him, he flirt with me." It is only forty years since the first Japanese legation was established in this country. Japan has sent to the United States a high class of representatives. In capacity and intelligence they are second to the statesmen of no nation. The new minister Mr. Takahira has had a long diplomatic experience. He has represented his country at The Hague, in Rome, Vienna and in China. Madame Takahira is a fine type of the advanced aristocratic class of Japan. This is not her first visit to America as her husband was Consul-General in New York in 1891. Mme. Takahira was educated at one of the best schools of Japan which was conducted after the Western fashion. She was married in 1887 and has accompanied her husband on his foreign missions. This contact with the official and social life of different European capitals has given Mme. Takahira the polish and ease of the true cosmopolite. Even by European standards Mme. Takahira would be ranked as a handsome woman. She has the soft dusky complexion for which Japanese women are famous, large dark expressive eyes and heavy dark hair. Her face is very mobile

In October he sailed into the harbor of New sation. She has magnificent jewels and dressto America.

> One of the most prominent figures in the of the strikers and these demonstrations brought many recruits to the army of strikers. Mother Jones showed all the skill and tact of a general at many trying moments during the great strike. She argued, used diplomacy, ridicule and eloquence and kept the spirits of the men bright. With it all she took the position she had won seriously and it is said that the president of the strikers-Mr. Mitchell-relied to a great extent on the advice of Mother

Wu Chao-chu is the son of Wu Ting Fang the Chinese minister to this country. To all appearance he is an every-day boy in his love of sport. He plays with the boys around the Chinese legation and jokes, plays pranks and games and conducts himself like the most democratic of Americans. He wears the Chinese dress with the exception of a pair of stout American shoes. Minister Wu came to America three years ago when Wu Chao-chu was eleven years old. The son was placed in that most American of public institutions—the public school. The little lad was born and bred in the restraint of the Chinese Empire but he possesses a "get there" quality which we are apt to consider purely American. He was handicapped by a strange language and was in unfamiliar surroundings, but in spite of this he completed a four years course in three years and was able to enter a Washington High School in September. Wu Junior has none of the passive stolidity that marks the Oriental. On the contrary he has a genuine spirit of humor and love of fun. He rides to and from school on his wheel and is very much interested in running his father's automobile. He spent last summer at Cape May where he learned to swim. The father and son are great chums and Minister Wu seems to enjoy his son's progress and assimilation of Western ideas, customs and manners. Nevertheless it is contact like this that has formed a liberal and advanced party in China and contributed towards the present crisis.

Mlle. Nouailher of Limoges, France, is a party to a very peculiar law suit now being decided in the highest court of France-the State Council. The young woman is immensely wealthy, owning a large portion of the real estate of Limoges. She conceived the idea that her mission in life was to make others happy. She lived in an immense villa in the heart of Limoges. To this home she brought hundreds of patients who were pronounced incurable and were in the last stages of consumption. The wards of the Paris hospitals were emptied into this beautiful country home. Mlle. Nouailher had no hope of restoring these people to health but extended her hospitality only to those who were dying. In less than four years Mile. Nouailher's guests had filled 2000 graves in the Limoges cemetery. The disease began to get a hold in the town and tourists avoided the place as the trains entering the station were filled with people in the last stages of consumption. Protests were made, finally mobs gathered and riots became frequent. Mlle. Nouailher stuck to her purpose and demanded the protection of the government. The case went into court and is now to be decided in the high-

Count Leo Tolstoy is the most remarkable figure of the day in the literary world. His recent excommunication by the Greek church is an event that has long been expected by those familiar with the daring of the religious views expressed in his novels. Purely and simply as a novelist judged from the standpoint of literary and artistic merit Tolstoy has few equals. His novels considered as photographic studies of human life and of Russian customs and ideas are fascinating. It is the peculiar ideas of the great Russian that have made the civilized world discuss and accept or reject him. A Russian noble belonging to the privileged classes, he chooses to live in a simplicity that means only the barest necessities of life. He believes that each man should earn his living with his own hands. His ancestra! lands have been given to the peasants. Tolsty is a firm believer in the command "Thou shalt do no murder." In a recent article he declared that the murder of monarchs was but the fulfillment of the Bible prophecy "They that shall take the life shall perish by the sword." In the same article he commented most bitterly upon William of Germany and Czar Nicholas. He declared that the Czar's Peace Conference was a childish, silly and untruthful project as he was ordering an increase of the army at the same time. For much less severe criticism men have been exiled to Siberia. It is his passionate protest against society as now constituted that makes Tolstoy the unique figure that he is. He is terribly, passionately, tragically in earnest and at odds with existing forms. His novels are tracts. It is remarkable that they are such finished pieces of literary work when their evident purpose is protest and reform.

A Mountain Delilah.

WRITTEN FOR COMPORT BY CHESTER LIVINGSTON.

HE gray shades of twilight were giving place to the heavier shadows of night. It was already dark in deep hollows of the Kentucky hills, for here night falls quickly. Upon a spur of a chain of knobs which bisects Casey County, a man stood with his head bowed in thought. The place where he stood was heavily wooded and extremely isolated. There was no sound or sign of human life anywhere, and to all appearances he was the only living being in all that vast expanse of forest. He was not a mountaineer

-a casual glance showed that. He was a young man, not over twenty-five, with a face almost boyish. His clothes were made for service, from rough strong material, and he wore top boots and a sombrero hat. A Winchester rifle was in his hand and a revolver was at his

This was Barton Langley, as intrepid and daring a revenue officer as the government had in its employ. He had taken up this life from choice about a year before, and during this time his name had become a positive curse to the evil-doers in the Kentucky mountains. He was subtle and shrewd, and had so schooled himself in their ways that he could, disguised, pass among them with impunity.

But there was one man who had so far escaped him, despite his scheming and his plans. And this was Abe Kent, who scoffed at the majesty of the law, and constantly eluded the hand of Justice. Langley had sworn to take him, single-handed, dead or alive, and for the past week the plot he had formed for this purpose had been slowly developing.

"It's time she was here," muttered the lonely officer, as the last gleam of day vanished and the moon came out from behind the ragged edge of a cloud. "Surely she won't fail me to-night. No; she cannot if she would. It's a mean, low-down thing to do, but there's my oath, and this is the only way, and-I owe a debt to some daughter of Eve!"

His eyes shone and his mouth contracted in a bitter smile at the recollection It had not been long ago-just a year, and the wound had not healed.

The brushing of leaves caught his quick ear, and he swung around with the revolver in his hand. But a moment later he smiled and placed it back in his belt, and held out his arms instead.

She came towards him, trustingly, and permitted him to gather her to his bosom. She was a little different from most mountain women. Her form was not stooped and crooked, nor her eyes lustreless and heavy. In- in her throat. stead, a buoyant youth was expressed in her young figure, her face was pretty, with a wild, untamed beauty, and her black hair fell over her shoulders unconfined. Barton Langley had seen worse-looking women in the drawing-rooms and parlors of society.

"Hev I kep' you waitin'?" she asked, gazing up at him with eyes which expressed the love in hèr soul.

"A little," he answered, bending down and kissing her. "But it makes no difference-a minute or two."

"I couldn't come sooner; I think they're gittin's'picious. Ain't-ain't there some other way, Barton?"

She laid her head on his shoulder, wearily. and his heart revolted in him at the part he had to play. For the moment he wished himself out of it, but it was too late now. The beginning of the end had come.

"No. Jane, my little girl, there's no other way," he said, caressing her hair with his hand. "And when it's all over, you will come with me, away from these hills and the wild people who live here. You will marry me, and we will be happy together."

"I'll do it, then-for you. But it ain't right, Barton, an' I've thought so all along. I don't know what you city people call right an' wrong, an' since you say you'd do ez much for me, I b'lieve you. But somethin' in me tells that I'm doin' wrong."

"Nonsense, little girl! Do you think I would let you do anything that wasn't right? Remember my oath, Jane. Without your help I will break it. Are you going back on me now, when the time has come?"

"No; I love you, Barton, an' I've promised you. I mus' go now, for he's comin' soon."

She released herself from his arms and stood looking into his face, reading its every line with searching eyes. A dark flush guiltily mantled his cheeks, but the broad rim of his hat hid it. The girl sighed and turned away, then moved by a sudden impulse, turned and came back to him. She put her hands on his shoulders and spoke:

"He's a bigger man than you, Barton, an' stronger. I'm 'fraid thet all won't go well."

The man laughed, lightly. "Leave that to me, girl. Everything shall happen as I have told."

"An'-an' you'll take me away with you? They'd kill me ef they knowed I done it. Even dad wouldn't lift his hand to save me ef he knowed."

The man drew her to him and kissed her again.

"As soon as it is over we shall leave together. I have horses down yonder—" pointing to a ravine at the foot of the south-western slope. "By daylight we shall be in safety."

"Good-bye," she answered. "I'll do it-for you."

And then he was alone again-alone with his accusing conscience and unbending determination.

Not over a mile from where he was standing, a brawny mountaineer was making his way along the side of a precipitous knob, his destination being a little hut hidden in an angle of the ridge. Abe Kent had loved Jane Penn for nearly a year, though she had given him but little encouragement. He followed her about like a dog and anticipated her every wish, but she treated him coolly, sometimes with incivility. It was not until about ten days ago that Abe saw the change for which he had waited so long. One night Jane came down to the still where he and her father were at work, and chatted with him for a long time-even giving him a smile when she left, and asking him to come to see her sometimes.

Abe wanted to thank God in his heart for this, but he didn't know how. But her visit had made his work lighter, somehow, and there was a feeling in his breast like he had been drinking new whiskey. A kind of happy, joyous feeling, which made the moonlight brighter, and the song of the night bird sweeter. He cut his work short, and went to see her the next night, and she looked at him tenderly once or twice, while making him keep his distance. But for the past week she had been slowly relenting, and last night-last night he had kissed her at parting, and she had told him that she loved him. And she had told him to come tonight, that she wanted the mysterious powers which Miss LeBlanc to be with him, and Abe was as happy as he cared to be.

forward to greet him. Her face was flushed, and her breath came fast, as though from exertion, but Abe thought it was all for love of him, as he swept her from her feet in his strong arms and held her to his breast.

"An' so you do love me, after all, Jane?" he said, placing her tenderly on the ground, and holding her pretty face between his big brown hands, where the moonlight fell full upon it. "I've waited fur ye long, long, long little gel! I thought the time wuz never comin'."

She felt a sudden, sick pang at her heart at his earnest words.

"It has been long, Abe, but I never loved ve before." "But ye do now-tell me that ye do now Jane; tell me thet ye love me!" "Yes, Abe; I love you."

But the words were husky, and almost stuck

"Come," she said, "let's set on the door-step. The night's too pretty to go in."

"I've been awful mean to you, Abe," she said when they were scated, "but I'm goin' to make up for it now."

She placed her arms around his neck and how peaceful and restful they looked. kissed his bearded cheek. The touch of her who sat beside her. He trembled all over, then turned and took her in his arms and held her there, pressing his lips again and again to her forehead, face and hair. When his first strong rush of love had spent itself, he leaned back Blancs. against the wall of the hut and tried to think, but his mind was in a whirl.

"Don't you pack but one pistol with you time drawing the heavy revolver from the belt at his waist, and laying it in her lap.

"Jes' one, Jane," he answered, "I've got another'n down at the still, but two uv 'em gits heavy. An' besides, them revenuers hey 'bout give up buntin' me, I think."

"Let me hev this pistol, Abe. I git lonesome here by myself, an' dad always takes his'n with 'im." Her voice was low and trembled a little, but

"Why, little gel, uv course it's yourn," he replied, delighted to grant the request. "All thet I've got's yourn, ef ye want it."

Abe thought it was timidity.

"Let me put it away, Abe," she said, rising. "Tomorrer you mus' come up an' learn me how teshoot it."

"Bring hit down to the still!" he called after her, merrily, "an' you kin shoot at the squir-rels all day!"

"You'll never see your still again, Abe Kent!" The mountaineer turned like a flash, and instinctively his hand went to his waist.

Not ten paces away a man was standing, and the bright moonlight glinted on the barrel of a revolver in his outstretched hand, with its muzzle pointed at the moonshiner's heart.

"You will either come with me, or your dead aloud." carcass shall lie here for some of your comrades to bury. Take your choice!"

Abe rose to his feet and as he did so he heard light footsteps behind him. Hope came to his heart. It was Jane, coming to his relief. He was in the shadow of the hut and he carefully held out his hand for the revolver he thought she was bringing. But instead, she flitted swiftly by him and in a moment was at the side of the revenue officer.

"Put these on him!" said the man, and with his disengaged hand he held out to her a pair of hand-cuffs.

She took them and started to obey, and then only light came to Abe's mind. With a hoarse cry of pain and anger he sprang forward. The report of the revolver sounded sharply on the quiet air, and Abe clutched his breast, but still came on. There was a knife in his hand now. and though bullet after bullet pierced his body he did not fall. Another second and Barton Langley and Abe Kent fell to earth together, the knife of the moonshiner piercing the heart of the revenue officer.

And now the story is told of a woman, from whose mind reason has fled, who wanders about the hills always seeking for some one whom she knew and loved, but whom she will never find.

HE next attraction on the evening's program is the wonderful performance of mind reading and second sight given by Prof. LeBlanc and his daughter Alline Le-Blanc. This performance has been witnessed by hundreds of the most famous scientists of this country and of Europe, who have declared themselves to be astounded at evidently possesses."

This, and much more, in the same vein. She was standing in the doorway, and came Henry Pendleton turned the program in his hand, listlessly, to see what was on the last page; and wondered why he had come to Spring Grove Park to spend the evening.

It was Saturday night. Mr. Pendleton, who was a young lawyer, had come to an inland New England city on business and had been detained longer than he had expected. Someone had told him that Spring Grove had a rustic theater, in which Pendleton found a really good variety show in operation. He had bought a ticket and sat down, only to find that variety shows-like everything else, he told himselfhad no longer any power to amuse him.

The theater was built in a grove of big hemlock trees. Two great trees stood at the front corners of the stage, and their trunks supported the proscenium arch. When the actors left the stage they disappeared into a thicket of evergreen shrubbery, amidst which the dressing rooms had been hullt, and the background was a vista of rich brown trunks which in the ranof the electric lights looked like pillars of a cathedral, as they rose straight and beautiful into the gloom of their green branches. Perdleton gazed off into the shadows and though.

A young man who played a piano at one corlips sent an electric thrill through the man ner of the stage, and constituted the entire orchestra, left his sect to shift the sign cards which announced in big black letters the name of each attraction on the program. The care he placed in front bore the names of the Le-

A large, well built man with dark hair and eyes came out upon the stage, accompanied by a slender young woman. The supers brough now, Abe?" she asked, presently, at the same on a table and a chair. On the table they placed what looked like an ordinary sofa pillow. The young woman sat down at the tabe so that her profile was towards the audience and the man bound a white handkerchief about her eyes. When he had done this he took from his pocket a contrivance which looked like one of the toy rattles which fakirs sell at fairs. He twirled this rapidly, and a melodious bumming sound filled all the place. The sound seemed to affect the young woman as the rattle of snake is said to charm a bird. Her head drooped slowly towards the table, until it rested upon the pillow. When she was asleep the professor took her head gently in his hands and turned it so it lay upon one side, upon the cushion, with the face in full view of the audience. Then he took his own station at a distance of several feet, standing with his back turned to the 'ble. The usual tests followed. The young woman, although apparently asleep, told numbers and names, in reponse to suggetions from persons in the audience, and answered questions.

"We will now proceed to the last and most difficult test," said the professor LeBlanc, "that of answering written questions sent to the stage and read only by myself, and that not

Slips of paper were handed through the seats. When the ushers offered them to Pendleton be waved them back, but a moment later, as if on second impulse, he reached out for a slip, wrote a few words upon it, and sent it up to the stage with the others.

The professor unfolded each slip, read it, and then, without a word, waited until his daughter answered the question which had been written upon the paper. Ejaculations of wonder, and sometimes of amusement, from different places in the room, showed that many of the questions were answered with surprising accuracy.

Pendleton looked on carelessly. He had no faith in the operation as anything but an adroit ex bibition of sleight of hand, and no interest in it further than to admire the skill of the performers.

Prof. LeBlanc unfolded a paper and read the question on it. For the first time the young Woman hesitated, and she waited so long that finally her father, as if to help her, read the question over to himself again. A moment later the girl spoke, more as if in conversation with someone than in answer to a question, and said:

"Francis Pendleton is not dead."

No one in the audience knew Henry Pendleton, or connected the well-dressed man in of the reserved seats with this answer. No one, therefore noticed how pale he grew. People looked about them for some sign of interest in this answer, and seeing and hearing none, judged that the person who had written the question had gone home, and so turned to the stage to wait for the next answer.

The question which Henry Pendleton had written on his slip of paper had been, "Where is my brother, Francis Pendleton, buried?"

No wonder that the answer made him grow pale, and say over and over to himself, "It is a trick. They cannot really know. It was only a shrewd guess on the girl's part."

Francis Pendleton had been an officer in an American Company in Cuba, and had died there. At least it had been reported that he had died, although there had been confusion and contradiction as to time and place, and final information as to where, he had been buried had been wholly lacking. The two brothers had been very dear to each other, and since peace had been declared Henry Pendleton had gone again and again over the field of the war in Cuba, seeking his older brother's grave. It was only recently that he had given up the search and come back to the States to take up again his long neglected business life.

All that night, after he had gone to his hotel, he did not sleep. By morning, although half angry with himself for doing so, he had resolved to seek out the mind readers and see if he could get any satisfaction from a talk with

The clerk in the hotel office did not know where the performers at the Park stopped. No doubt the proprietor of the theater there knew, he said, but it was noon before Pendleton found this man, and then only to learn that the engagement of Prof. LeBlanc and his daughter had ended with the previous evening and that they had taken a midnight train for Pendleton said to himself, "How foolish to think more of them. I will put the matter out of my mind," and then finished up his business as quickly as he could, and bought a ticket for the city to which the LeBlancs had gone.

When he came to meet the professor and his daughter he was somewhat surprised to find them refined, well-educated people, not at all the obvious imposters whom he had expected. The young woman said frankly, "I cannot explain what I do, for I do not understand it myself. I only know that I seem to be dreaming. When I wake I learn that I have been talking of the places and people I have seen in my dreams, and I find that some of the people who hear me recognize in what I have said answers to questions which they have asked." Pendleton's question of a few days before, the young woman remembered nothing.

During this interview Pendleton told them nothing of his reasons for seeking them out, other than that he had been interested in a previous test which he had seen them make. He reasoned to himself that the less these people knew of the matter which he wished to investigate, the easier it would be for him to decide if he were being imposed upon.

"Come to the theater tonight and make another trial," said the professor.

"Possibly;" was the answer.

That night the young man wrote on the slip of paper which he sent up to the stage: "Where is Francis Pendleton?"

read questions came from the lips of the apparently unconscious young woman. The man listened eagerly to the first words of each and then, when he found that they did not concern him, waited impatiently for the next.

"I see a slight young man standing beneath orange trees. The fruit falls vellow about him. I cannot see his face. His head seems hidden in a cloud. From his left hand two fingers have been cut. A black man comes and leads him away. I see the ocean gleam through the trees, and warships float upon the water."

Pendleton knew that his question was answered. But was that all?

The next night he asked, "What is the name of the place where Francis Pendleton is living?" and got no answer. The next night he tried again. "Is Francis Pendleton in Havana?" and was answered "No." Then he asked "Santiago?" and received a similar reply. The next night, almost by chance, he wrote upon his slip of paper the word, "Tampa?"

"He is at Tampa," was the reply. There was no intimation as to who it was that was at Tampa, but Pendleton felt sure it was his question which was answered, and that night start-

Old-fashioned Training.

Its Strong and Weak Points.

The strong point of the old-fashioned training was the stress laid upon morality and virtue. "Be good and you'll be happy," was the common precept set before the growing child. But as the girl grew up to maidenhood she was often sorely puzzled to reconcile those past teachings with her present condition. She was good. Her soul was pure as the lilies of her garden. Her heart was undefiled. And Pierce and his staff (numbering nearly a score yet she was desperately unhappy by reason of physical ailments common to women.

This was the weak side of oldfashioned training: It ignored the needs and requirements of the body. All its effort was to guide the heart and mind. The body might stumble along anyhow, and it generally did.

Many a sweetfaced, modestminded young girl has had her first doubts of the goodness of Providence come in through the door of physical suffering.

way?" she asks, "Why does my back ache? Why does my head throb and my side pain, so superiority over other put-up medicines for that I am fain to creep away into a darkened room and forego the pleasure which belongs to my season of life?"

NO ANSWER COMES

as a rule to these questions. The young woman looks around and sees scores of similar sufferers. She is told it is a part of the burden laid upon women, and she shapes her shoulders to her heavy load.

This is all a mistake. Proper training, proper physical care would many times prevent these miserable conditions. But in any case, however distressing the present condition, it can be cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, if it is a disease curable by medi-

"I write a few lines to thank you for your advice and grand remedies, to which I owe my health, and perhaps my life," says Miss Flora I. Greer, of 107 Howe Street, Akron, Ohio. "My trouble started during my childhood, but did not prove serious until 1893, when I met with an accident caused by a horse running away. From that time I did not see a well day. I suffered at every monthly period with terrible headache, irritation of the spine and pains in my heels so I could not bear them resting on the softest pillow. What I suffered pen could never describe. I had soreness through my hips and ovaries all the time and constant backache. Was afraid to be alone, imagined that every one hated me, and everything looked like a mountain. One doctor would tell me one thing ailed me, another would say something altogether different, but they only relieved me. I then wrote you in April, 1899, through the advice of a neighbor, and followed your advice from April to July. I took five bottles of Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription, and four of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and five vials of 'Pellets.' Have not had a single symptom of my old troubles so far. Can sleep good nights, work hard, and can eat solid and substantial food without distress. There are several of my friends taking your medicines with the best results since they have seen how they helped me.

HEALTH FOR WOMEN.

The use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has brought health to thousands of hopeless women. If you are sick it will almost surely bring health to you. In all the hundreds of housands who have used "Favorite Prescripion" for womanly ills, only two in every hundred have failed of a perfect and permanent cure. And even these two in every hundred have been benefited, their pains eased, their burdens lightened, their lives made happier.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription establishes regularity, dries enfeebling and unhealthy drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness. From the first change of life when the girl becomes a woman to the last change of life it is a "Godsend to women" as a preservative of health and a cure for womanly ills.

"Your letter just received," writes Miss Rose Kilfether, of 43 West Sharpnack St., Germantroubles that I ever have tried. Sorry I did not one day, a year afterwards, the two brothers know of your 'Favorite Prescription' years ago, but will gladly tell my friends who are suffering, of your wonderful medicine. I cannot speak too highly of it."

There is no alcohol in "Favorite Prescription" and it is entirely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

Sick and ailing women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. All correspondence held as sacred and womanly confidences guarded by the same strict professional privacy which is observed in the personal consultations of Dr.

Weeks of search in Tampa and its vicinity were fruitless. Advertisements were of no avail. At times Pendleton swore he had been tricked; and told himself that he would give up the search.

One day he had gone a few miles into the country to a village in which there had seemed to be a clue. The journey had proved as useless as the others and he was returning discouraged. The heat and the monotony of a slow local train combined to make him fall asleep. There came to him in a dream the sight of the girl, back in the New England forest, and once more he heard her say: "I see a slight young man standing beneath orange trees-A breath of air which seemed to him, sleeping, to be fragrant with the scent of hemlocks, blew over his face and woke him. The train was running slowly, as Florida trains seem to like to do-through an orange grove. The yellow fruit hung from the trees and gleamed upon the ground, and there, standing beneath one of the trees, Henry Pendleton saw his brother. Even while he watched through the open car window, a black man came and took his brother by the hand and led him away among the trees.

Pendleton would have jumped from the train if the brakeman would have let him. The best he could do was to hasten back from the next station. He found the orange grove, and living in it in a neat little new log house, his brother, physically strong but mentally a wreck, tenderly cared for by the black man who owned the plantation and the other houses upon it.

"He saved my life in a fight there, one day," the negro said, "and just a few minutes later dropped down himself as if dead from the heat of the sun. I pulled him into the bushes, and then the Spaniards came that way and I didn't dare to come out. I found a native hut and got him into that, and took care of him. Before he was strong enough to stand up the troops had gone. I put him on to a sponge sloop and brought him here. I own my little place and he should never have wanted for food. He is good, but he has never known anything since that day he fell down in the

Nor did the man knew his brother. Henry Pendleton might have been the greatest stranger in all the world to him. Of the two he went quickest to the negro's side.

All that passed away, though, under skillful brain surgery in a New York hospital, and in time Henry Pendleton had his brother back, town, Philadelphia, Pa. "My daughter is dead," he said, to the young man's question, and then, before they could say more, he had passed on into the crowd.

There are many things in this world which we cannot understand—not at first, at least. Is it not better to say of them, "I do not know," than to cry at once, "It is foolish, wrong, fraud,

The Counsellor's Appointment.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY EMERSON GARDNER.

OUNG Mr. Robinson, known professionally as William-B. Robinson, Esq., was plainly out of sorts. Apparently there was no good reason for this, for he had done a good morning's work, and had had a more elaborate luncheon and a much better cigar than usual. Moreover his fee was in his pocket and he intended to spend two happy hours that afternoon listening to Madam whose last piano recital for several seasons was announced. He had told his wife not to call for him on her way to the concert hall, fearing that some business might interfere with their proposed pleasure, but that he would join her if he could get away.

Now, as he sat at his desk looking through the columns of the "Enquirer" having a top drawer open for its sudden concealment in case a hand should rest on his doorknob or a shadow pause before his glass door, there was a distinct frown upon his fine face. Five minutes earlier, seemingly at peace with the world, his expression had been calm and he had hummed softly to himself as he drew up his chair and unfastened the red ribbon from a package of severe looking papers so as to appear busily engaged should a client suddenly call; but now he was in a savage temper. The mere ringing of his telephone bell had of itself produced no more than the customary fleeting scowl of impatience, but he had sworn under his breath when in response to his "Hello" that curt message had come-"Burton wants me to tell you to be in your office without fail a little before half past two."

Now this same Burton was a good and wealthy client with a most admirable faculty of getting into trouble, but his interviews were invariably irritating because of their great length. So Robinson swore, as I said, then answering "all right" had proceeded to work up a bit of a rage which had held him ever since.

Madame's recital was down for two thirty, and the "Sonata Pathetique" (his favorite) was her third number, and must be over long before he could part from his client. "Confound the old fool and his affairs!" he stormed. "I hate this being tied to my desk, anyway! Why didn't I know enough to cut loose early and not get caught here until tomorrow. This everlasting business is always interfering with a fellow's pleasures, and no one but my wife has any feeling for me when I have to stay away from such a recital as this. I suppose if I loved whiskey instead of good music, I'd get more sympathy when I absent myself cccasionally, and most people would say, "poor chap," instead of "crank!"

"Well, I've got to stay here and see him, of course, but it's a cursed shame all the same!"

Now all this goes to show that our young friend was in better accord with Beethoven and Schubert and Mendelssohn than Blackstone, Addison and Storey, and this outbreak was by no means his first of the kind. The elder Robinson had been a stern cold man of the law, powerful mentally, but deaf and blind artistically, and no one knew whence his son and professional successor had acquired his absorbing love for art. That he had it, could not be denied, and he was often miserable in consequence. Music, especially, was his 'curse' as he himself put it in moments of impatient anger, and those of us who know what a jealous mistress she is and how she demands attention and devotion at all sorts of inopportune moments, can give him ready

He had inherited but one trait from his father,—a rare one too, in a music lover—a keen appreciation of the need of something serious appreciation of the need of something serious in the way of a life work, and a full realization of the effects of that careless disregard of such which seemed to characterize most of his "artist" acquaintances. Therefore he worked, not so much to acquire money as to avoid those troubles which come from the lack of it. His troubles which come from the lack of it. His law studies had always been irksome to him, and while he had by hard work mastered their foundation principles, he had never found them interesting or attractive. He probably would never have fought his way to the Bar had it not been for this inherited commercial instinct which showed the probability of succeeding to his father's lucrative practice if he would but prepare himself to receive it. So strong was his taste for music, even in his earlier youth, that his promotion into the Junior class at the Law school had been seriously imperilled by the fact that on the day set for exstrong was his taste for music, even in his earlier youth, that his promotion into the Junior class at the Law school had been seriously imperilled by the fact that on the day set for examinations the pupils of the Conservatory of Music in the adjoining building held their closing exercises. The day being warm and windows open, the June breeze had brought the sound of the piano into the class-room where he sat with but one hour allotted for the answering of ten dry and complicated questions on "Contracts." So absorbed was he in listening that forty minutes had slipped by before he had written a word. He had been noting with pleased surprise the near approach to the requisite in the smooth playing of the "Nachtstuck;" the unusual power of execution in the opening bars of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," and the dainty lightness of a Chopin study, and did not care a whit whether "A's" telegrams to "B" about the purchase of "a certain number of bales of cotton of a certain weight and quality, to be delivered at a certain place, at a certain time, by a certain railroad, for a certain price," and "B's" wired message in reply thereto, did or did not "constitute a binding agreement."

A pause in the Conservatory program brought him to his senses, face to face with the fact that only twenty minutes were left for work, and that the other fellows were red-faced and tousled from their anxious exertions. Fortunately he recalled the advice of a friendly Senior, who had said to him that morning, "Robbie, old man, when you get old Burnett's paper on "Contracts' pick out the first question you see that you are sure of, and write all you can about it. The old man told me once, when I was helping him examine some papers, that he would never turn down a man who could discuss any one of his questions broadly and intelligently so as to convince him of absolute understanding of the points involved." This bit of advice had pulled Robinson through on "Contracts."

Since the student had become the practitioner he had fought his same f advice had pulled Robinson through on "Contracts."

Since the student had become the practitioner he had fought this same fight within himself many times, and the conflict of to-day was but a repetition of many similar experiences.

The determination to wait for old Burton, while it was made instantly, was but the working out of many of these early mental struggles in which better judgment, accompanied by bad temper, always prevailed.

Looking once more into the office we find that the "Enquirer" has been thrown aside, and that a second cigar is being flercely puffed—also that the papers in "Burton vs. Harris" have been hauled out from their tin restingplace for one more thorough reading.

As Robinson is in the midst of an effort to master the tiresome details of the case, a light step sounds in the hall, and in a second or two the opening door reveals Mrs. Robinson clad in her very best, and asking, "Shall you be able to go, dear?"

"No," he replies, drawing her to a chair, and her very best, and asking, go, dear?"

"No," he replies, drawing her to a chair, and speaking wearily, for his anger has gone, leaving only keen disappointment. "I must wait here for old Burton. He telephoned in a little while ago, saying I must be sure to be here a little before half past two. Hard luck, I call it. What are you laughing at?" he says, swinging 'round in his chair in surprise (for heretofore Mrs. Robinson has always been sweetly sympathetic on these occasions).

Mrs. Robinson has always been sweetly sympathetic on these occasions).

"Oh! you poor dear boy!" she stammers, choking with merriment, "get your coat on this minute. It was I who sent that telephone message because I had left my purse at home and must see you before the concert. I was so busy when I got in town that I couldn't come 'way down here to find you, so I got Uncle George to call you up from his store and tell you I would be in just before half past and for you to be sure to wait, and"—But Robinson had got into his coat. A neat card bearing the legend, "Out of Town—Return to-morrow", was already on the door, and as the key turned, two gloved hands squeezed his arm and a soft was already on the door, and as the key turned, two gloved hands squeezed his arm and a soft voice said apologetically, "Really, Will, I never once thought that 'Bertha' and 'Burton' might sound alike over the wire!"

The Severed Hand.

FIRST swung my shingle to the breeze in a thriving little town a few miles out of Boston. Like all country doctors my night calls often exceeded my day's work so I was not surprised one night when a carriage drove up in front of my house a little before midnight and an imperative ring at the bell summoned my presence. I responded to the bell as soon as possible, and upon opening the door was surprised to see a masked on my fingers. But I was ambitious and poor, and knew it would not do to speak of inexperience.

"Do you wish to earn five hundred dollars before morning?" he asked next. My heart throbbed with delight but I replied cautiously:

"If I could earn such an amount honestly I should be pleased to do so, but when a man comes to me with a mask over his face, it looks suspicious. I will do no dirty work, much as I need the money."

need the money."

He replied in a cold, haughty tone that he required the services of a surgeon and he was willing to pay liberally. If he did not wish to reveal his identity that was his own business. If I did not desire the work he would seek help elsewhere. I could not risk losing so large a fee and asked in a more conciliatory tone what the nature of the operation was.

"It is the amputation of a hand," he replied.

"My wife has been bitten by a poisonous reptile and unless the hand is amputated at once she will lose her arm, perhaps her life. Have you the proper instruments, and can you come you the proper instruments, and can you come at once?"

My interest and sympathy were aroused at once and I commenced to pack my surgical case.

"I shall need assistance," I said.
"I will assist you," he replied. "I am somewhat of a surgeon myself. There is a nurse who will help by administering the chloroform."

I was soon ready and we entered the carriage and were driven rapidly through the muddy streets. It was impossible for me to keep track of the locality after we left the town and entered the country roads, with trees to obstruct the view and the rain pouring in sheets upon the small glass in the door. We stopped, after an hour's ride, at the side entrance of what looked to be a large, handsome, summer residence with extensive grounds surrounding it. There were no lights and I must confess to a qualmish feeling as I followed my guide up the wet stone steps into the portico, and waited for him to unfasten the massive door.

When we entered the hall I was grateful for wet stone steps into the portico, and waited for him to unfasten the massive door.

When we entered the hall I was grateful for the warmth and a dim light that revealed a handsome interior. I followed my masked guide up a broad flight of stairs and through another dimly lighted hall to a chamber. Here, also, the lights were dim, but I could see that it was luxuriously furnished. In the center of the room stood a large canopied bed. The curtains were looped back from one side, revealing the outlines of a form.

"I shall need more light," I said.

My guide spoke to a woman who had been standing on the other side of the bed, unnoticed by me until she crossed the room to fetch a lamp which stood on a small table. I then saw that she wore the attire of a nurse. Approaching the bed I bent over the patient, who lay motionless, her face turned from me. The arrangement of her hair and the draperies were such that all I could see was a small dainty ear and a pale cheek on which rested long, dark lashes. Her hand and arm lay on the outside of the coverlet. The hand was bandaged.

I wished to take the pulse and examine the condition of my patient before beginning the operation, but the husband convinced me that she was comfortable and already under the influence of an anesthetic, and it was not best to disturb her, but hasten the operation before it was too late.

The nurse had already prepared towels, sponges and water, and deftly helped me arrange the rubber blanket under the arm of the patient. It hen gently removed the bandages, and a small, beautifully formed hand lay exposed. But upon the back was a red mark, surrounded by a discolored circle. The fingers were purple and cold. It was a very bad looking hand, indeed, and I firmly believed that only amoutation would save the arm, and per-ing hand, indeed, and I firmly believed that only amputation would save the arm, and perhaps the life of the poor girl upon the bed.

I had not yet grown callous with much cutting, and I needed all my nerve to sink my knife into the pretty white wrist. Beads of perspiration covered my forehead, but I pressed my lips firmly together while I swiftly and silently did my work. It was finished at last; the arteries tied; the last stitch taken; and the poor little discarded hand lay in the midst of bloody cloths and wet sponges.

All doctors take a certain amount of pleasure in preserving tumors, tapeworms, and other gruesome trophies of their surgical skill. So while pretending to sweep all refuse together and deposit in the jar brought by the nurse, I slipped the little hand into my pocket.

The patient was recovering from the effect of the chloroform and in a safe condition to leave, so, as the husband seemed anxious I should depart as soon as possible, I repacked my surgical case, received my fee in bank notes, and was hustled into the carriage.

"I must see your wife again in about three days," I said, as he was about to shut the carriage door.

Inen with the order to "drive like the devil" the coachman touched up his horses, and we drove away.

I tried my best to distinguish the route, but all I could see were trees, vacant meadows, and now and then a farm house. It must have been about four o'clock when I reached home, for the gray light of a new day was lighting the landscape.

I went to my office and locked myself in. Drawing the hand from my pocket, I examined it with much professional pride. What a pretty hand it must have been before its beauty was marred. Taking a microscope, I scrutinized the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot her the spot where the reptile had fastened its scratch or a heart of the spot her the spot her the spot her the deadly fanges. marred. Taking a microscope, I scrutinized the spot where the reptile had fastened its deadly fangs. To my surprise there was no scratch or abrasion of the skin, and what had looked like mortification by lamp light, now looked like a dark stain.

With wildly beating heart, I took a wet sponge and drew it across the hand. My suspicions were confirmed when the stain was suspicions were confirmed when the stain was washed away revealing the marble white flesh beneath, without scar, scratch, or blemish of any kind. I sank into a chair overcome by my discovery. I had amputated a healthy hand! There was no poisonous bite; no disease; no occasion for its removal. My God! what did it mean. I had been made the dupe and tool of some devil in human shape. The hand had been skillfully painted and bandaged to decieve me.

I walked up and down the room in a frenzy of horror. I put on my hat and started to notify the police; but when I reached the door I realized it would be useless, as I could not direct them to the house. I was helpless to make any effort. I must drop the case just where it was, enveloped in mystery and horror, and try to dismiss it from my mind.

I placed the hand in a jar of alcohol—I could not bring myself to bury it—and placed it on the top shelf of my closet, out of sight.

It was years before I could use a surgical knife without a shudder, but time dulls all sensations be they grief or pain, so, as the years glided by the memory of that night's horror became more like a dream than an actual experience.

About two years ago I was called to the bed-side of a woman who had been convicted of murder and sentenced to the gallows for kill-ing her husband. It looked as though the law was to be deprived of administering the proper punishment, and in spite of judge and jury the roor woman was about to escape and plead her punishment, and in spite of judge and jury the poor woman was about to escape and plead her case before a higher tribunal. So I was sent for to prevent the escape if possible, and save her neck for the hangman's noose.

I had read her trial with much interest, and sympathized with the poor woman, goaded to desperation by a brutal husband. I was glad of the opportunity of seeing her, and when called I obeyed with alacrity. I had seen pictures of her in the papers, but they poorly represented the sweet patient face I saw resting upon the coarse pillow in a convict cell. She turned, and gazed at me with her big mournturned, and gazed at me with her big mournful eyes, and said:
"Don't try to save me, doctor, I have nothing

"Don't try to save me, doctor, I have nothing to live for, and it would be easier to die this way, than that other," and she shuddered. I tried to speak words of comfort and cheer, and expressed my sympathy for her. She seemed grateful, and thanked me.

I was about to place my fingers upon her wrist when she drew it away, exclaiming with a bitter laugh:

"You will find no pulse there, doctor that is an artificial hand."

"You will find no pulse there, doctor that is an artificial hand."

I drew back with a shudder, gazing at the waxy member with fascinated eyes. It was the counterpart of the little white hand hid away on the top shelf of my surgical closet.

"How long ago did you lose it!" I asked, in trembling tones.

trembling tones.
"Eight years last March," she answered.

trembling tones.

"Eight years last March," she answered. sadly.

"How?" I gasped.

"When I was young," she continued, in the same low, sad tone. "I possessed a quick, passionate temper, and one day, taunted to the verge of madness by a jealous husband, I struck him. In revenge he drugged me, hired some accomplices, and had the hand that dared to strike him cut off. It was a fiendish act, and well worthy of him. I left him, and with my child sought my parents' protection. He stole my child and, when I heard how it had died of neglect, crying for mamma, I struck him again. This time I had a knife, so he did not live long enough to have the other hand cut off. I am not sorry I did it, but I would rather pass away peacefully, if you will let me," and she gazed pleadingly into my face.

Here was the solution to the mystery that had haunted me for years. I had been instrumental in carrying out the cruel revenge of a brutal husband. There was one gleam of comfort, she had killed the brute and I was glad of it.

By skillful questioning I obtained the whole sad history of her unhappy life, and at its conclusion I told her of my share in the terrible deed and implored her forgiveness for unconsciously aiding her inhuman husband. She exonerated me from all blame, making me

Now a new horror assailed me. I had brought her back from the grave; I had saved her life. For what? Death upon the gallows! I had learned to love her, and she returned my love. Must this be the end? No, a thou-

A Little Rebel.

A True Story.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY LOUISE SNOW.

Copyright, 1901 by W. H. Gannett, Publisher

O-ho! You wish that you might go with me to meet the Invaders, do you, little Angel?

"Why, you were afeared at the invasion of a harmless mouse within your chamber, but yester morn!

"And, what could you do, either? The sight of those waving plumes and scarlet jackets would fright you out of all the spirit there is within your little body, let alone the rattle of sword and bayonet, and the boom and roar of cannon!

"But, wast a ad now. Sunshine! Then should you don sword and buckler, 'And off to the wars,' with your old soldier father, in truth, child! "But, hie away, sweet, to your spinnet and embroidery frame, as doth best befit you, and think not upon dour war and soldiery!

"Farewell, now, my Angel, and send up your prayers, prithee, 'till father comes safe and victoriously home again to his little maid!"

So bidding adieu to his devoted daughter, brave old General Schuyler rode away with his men to meet and drive back that great army threatening the invasion of New York, and the other strong places in its vicinity.

Down the steep hill the rebel soldiers clattered, across the bridge and out of sight; and little Angelike stood ruefully watching them until they were gone.

"If only she were a lad!"
That was what her father had said. And he doubted her spirit, and had laughed at her, because she had run from a little mouse.
"I know that I must seem a silly little coward, or father would never have made such sport of me, and he so brave and noble!" she murmured in bitter displeasure with herself.

Then she went slowly back toward the fine old colonial mansion on the heights above the busy city of Albany, where she was born and had always lived.

busy city of Albany, where she was born and had always lived.

But what would little sixteen years old Angel have thought, could her bright eyes have pierced the veil of the future, and seen her dear home again and again changed owners, after it had passed from the descendants of her soldier father, until at last it was used for an orphan girls' school?

Her own dainty chamber, where she was every night tucked snugly into her dimity covered and curtained bed with tender, loving mother hands, become remodeled into a dormitory for motherless little ones.

But the loving hands, and Angel's dimpled ones have long been folded at rest.

Little Angel went around to the stables to pet her brown pony, 'Patra, trying so to forget her mortification and sorrow.

While she stood stroking 'Patra's glossy mane, as she contentedly ate her sliced carrots, Angel heard:

"Dem Redoats gwine ies' cum', 'n' tak', 'ses-

"Why don't you cut it, then? Cut and store it, hide it away, instead of standing there talking about it, you lazy fellows!" exclaimed Angelike, with angry, sparkling light in her eyes, that made Cæsar cringe, and ejaculate, "Look jes' lak' ol' mas'r gin'ri', 'clar!" "Bress you, Miss 'Gleke!" spoke up old Pomp', "Couldn't do dat, nohows, all dem gre't fiel's! 'N' 'sides, mas'r didn't tol' us to, 'n' we darsn't tech it 'til mas'r tol' us to, nohows!"

She looked out on the broad table lands, where her father's rich fields of grain were waving and gleaming in the glow of the setting sun.

Long she sat by the open window, breathing the sweet scented air and wondering why there should be cruel war to break up and destroy peaceful and happy homes like hers.

"Yes, war is wicked and I hate it, and I'm only a girl, and a paltry coward at that!" she sighed. "But if I were only father's brave lad, though, I would never make war on the innocent and harmless, yet how I'd battle for those beautiful fields of grain and for our dear home!"

home!"
And the last thing before she climbed into her quaint white bed she took a lingering look at those heavy, spreading grain fields of her beloved father, with no one to defend and save them from the enemy.

When she went out the next morning to greet 'Patra, old Pomp' rushed up toward her breathless, with the whites only of his eyes showing, bursting forth with "Oh, Missy 'Gleke! Missy 'Gleke!" but could only roll his eyes and beat his poor old hands and head, ur-

"'Deed, little mist'es, whateber you t'ink?" he gasped fearfully. "Whateber you t'ink happen dem fiel's now! Dem Redcoats jes, done gwine 'n' 'sess 'n' pillage dem fiel's, mas's' grain fiel's, in de night time, 'n' him plum done gwine to meet 'em, too!"

"Oh, Pomp'! Have they come at night and plundered our beautiful fields while we were all asleep! And they didn't come near the house, after all! They couldn't have or we surely must have seen or heard them. But not a sound nor sign of them has there been. How strange. How could they cut and carry off all those great fields of grain and not awaken a single one of us all?"

"Why, Missy 'Gleke, dey didn't nebber carry dem off—couldn't nohows, 'thout 'wakin' ol' Pomp', sartain! Dey's burned 'em! Jes' gwine 'n' burned all dem gre't fiel's of mas'rs' grain plum' right down to de groun'!"

Strange it may seem, but before leaving her room in the morning, Angel had not once thought of those fields, nor even looked from her window. Now she turned and fairly flew toward them.

And when she saw the dreadful blackened

And when she saw the dreadful, blackened waste of still smoking and scorched and burning fields, where only yesterday the rich waving grain stood, she looked wildly around and clasping her head in her hands, shrieked:

"Oh, my dream, my horrible dream! It's come true! I did it, I did it! I burned the field's myself, so that the Redcoats might not have them! Oh, oh! I dreamed that I did. I'd forgotten all about it. But I remember now! I got up in the night and set fire to and burned all my father's fields of grain so that the Redcoats couldn't pillage them! Oh, what will father say?"

father say?"

And then little Angelike fainted entirely away, and old Pomp' carried her into the house to her mother.

They found her little night-gown all charred with the coals which she had gathered at the covered fire in the big kitchen fireplace and carried out among the day grain, and which the strong wind had fanned into a quick blaze, that had worked such destruction.

When she had recovered from her faint, her mother nityingly said when she had recovered from her faint, her mother pityingly said, "Oh, Angelike, daughter, you've been walking in your sleep again!"

"What will my father say?" was all Angelike's rooly

ing in your sleep again!"

"What will my father say?" was all Angelike's reply.

What the leader of the invading host said when he came and found that those fine fields, which he had hoped himself to see gathered and garnered, had been already reaped by flaming sickle, were words of wrath and sore disappointment.

But when he had heard the story of their strange garnering, he laughed right merrily and called for Angelike, who, perforce and much against her wish and proud spirit, must go at the command and make answer for what she had done.

"I liked not," she bravely replied, when questioned about what she had done, "I liked not that others should unjustly reap what my father had sown and labored for!"

Then she sorrowfully and humbly bent the stately small head, before thrown so proudly back, and sadly and regretfully said:

"And yet I meant not to destroy my father's beautiful fields!"

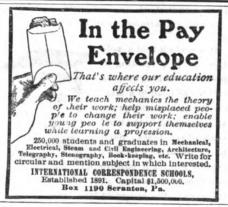

The Redcoat General looked at her sharply, while she flinched not and added,

"The field's are my father's and you had no right to pillage them!"

"True. Might does not make right," thoughtfully and gravely answered the General, as he kindly stroked little Angelike's uplifted head, and smiling, said,

"Forsooth! A brave little rebel!"

and smiling, said,
"Forsooth! A brave little rebel!"

The position of Lord Chief Justice of England is one of great responsibility and distinction. The new chief justice to succeed Lord Russell, Lord Alverstone, has long been considered one of the leaders of the English bar and it was anticipated that he would be offered the great position. The new chief justice is fortyeight years of age. His former title was Sir Richard Everard Webster. His early education was gained at the famous King's College School Charterhouse and at Trinity College Cambridge. He ranked high as a student and his success was predicted while he was still at college. Cambridge early recognized his ability and growing success by giving him the honorary degrees of M. A. and LL. D. In 1862 he was admitted to the bar although he was but twenty years of age. He held minor offices in the court of exchequer. In 1885, he entered the English parliament and in the same year was chosen attorney general. He was twice reappointed to this position. He has been prominently connected with many important ability as a lawyer and the merit that he has shown in filling lesser positions.

The Empress Dowager of Germany has had rather a sad life even for royalty. Her recent illness showed that she had a real place in the hearts of the people of both Germany and England. Her many graces and virtues have won this kindly feeling in spite of many adverse political influences. Victoria, Princess Royal of England is Queen Victoria's eldest child. In 1858 she married Crown Prince Frederick of Germany. The marriage was a happy one but the German people had an idea that the English princess had too much influence with her husband. Six children were born all of whom are living. The eldest son is Emperor of Germany and the youngest daughter has married Prince Frederick of Hesse. Eighteen grandchildren are living, seven of whom are children of the present Emperor. Victoria ruled as Empress but a few months and those months were full of anxiety as to the health of the Emperor. In 1888 the fatal malady under whose shadow his reign had commenced reached a fatal termination. Many rumors of strained relations between the Emperor and his mother have been heard but to all appearances he has always been a faithful and devoted son.

On January the seventeenth Holland's girl queen will wed. She has announced the fact in the Official Gazette. For three years she has ruled the little kingdom of dykes, windmills and colonial possessions and all the world has smiled kindly at her as the fairy princess of the century. Her Prince Consort is Duke Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He is twenty-four while the Queen is twenty-one. The young Duke is not very well known outside of court circles of his own duchy. His British army. Wolseley saw his first active house is one of the oldest in Europe and traces its descent through twenty-five generations. He is quiet and unobtrusive and is said to have many elements of strength in his character. Be it as it may, he has won the affection of the young queen for this royal marriage unlike most is a love match. It was only last year that Queen Wilhelmina met the Duke at Berlin. She had heard much of him through his sister-in-law who is one of the Queen's intimates. It was a case of love at first sight as Queen Wilhelmina refused to attend a dinner when aspirants for her hand were to be presented claiming that she had a cold. Soon after she returned to Holland and after inquiries had developed only favorable reports of the young Duke, Wilhelmina was given the opportunity for further acquaintance. So favorable to Duke Henry was the result that the Prime Minister was called to the summer palace to receive the news of the formal betrothal of his young ruler. The Queen gave leisure that has come at the end of his active der, a brunette with deep thoughtful brown SEARS, ROEBUCK & CO. (Inc.), CHIC

So they are to be married and many thousands even in democratic America will say sincerely "May she be happy ever after" for the Girl Queen has won the fancy and affection of a world.

The niece of President McKinley is a teacher in a Connecticut High School. Of her own choice Grace McKinley has planned to work out her own ideals of a self-supporting woman. Miss McKinley is but twenty-one years of age. She is very attractive in appearance with a tall handsome figure, dark brown curly hair and deep blue eyes. Her father was James McKinley brother to the President. He wont to San Francisco to make his fortune. He died without having achieved success and his wife soon followed him leaving the little orphan of three years to the care of her grandmother McKinley. A year ago last June the young woman received the degree of B. A. from Mount Holyoke College. Both the President and Mrs. McKinley were present at the Commencement. It is said that they offered to adopt their niece and give her the pleasures and advantages that a residence in the White House afford. Miss Grace spent one winter in Washington but the desire was strong within her to use the educacases and his elevation to the chief justiceship tion she had gained in a practical way and last is considered a just tribute to his practical September she took a position in a High School. There is a commendable spirit of independence in this choice. It requires more than average devotion to an ideal to forego all that a Washington winter can offer to pursue a line of work in a quiet little New England village.

Field Marshal, Viscount Wolseley, has resigned the place of Commander-in-Chief of the British Navy to Lord Roberts. His active career as a soldier may be considered as finished but his ceaseless self activity will show itself in his cultivation of the many interests that he has found time to develop even in the strenuous life of a soldier. Viscount Wolseley has a many sided nature. Soldiering has been his vocation but his avocations include a knowledge of values of bric-abrac, a fondness for sketching and a love of literature. He has written some books, among them being an account of the rebellion in China in 1860. He is now engaged in his favorite project of writing a life of England's greatest soldier, Marlborough. This thought has been in his mind for forty years and he expects to visit the scenes of all of Marlborough's battles from Blenheim down, and to compare the tactics employed with the geography of the battlefields. Wolseley's career as a soldier has been a steady course of advancement, won wholly by his own merits. When he was retired from the highest position in the army he could feel that his rank was won almost against the work. The record of Miss Mary E. Woolcourt and social influence. General Wolselev comes of a line of soldiers. One of his ancestors served under the soldier statesman, William III, and his own father was a major in the service in Burmah. He served all through the student of history. A few weeks after this, in charge of the Red River expedition. At this time he was but thirty-six years of age. From that time his advance was rapid. He was a Major General at forty; General at fifty, Field Marshal at sixty. The personal side of his character is the element that has made him successful. He has a splendid exuberant vitality that gives him courage and lightheartedness in the face of difficulties that would daunt a man of different temperament. He has a wholesome distaste for mere detail and millinery but a faculty for grasping the essential points of a situation that has led him to success. During the time when he was at the head of the British army he introduced many radical changes and reforms. Time has demonstrated the practical necessity of some of his reforms and the loss to England resulting from a neglect of his advice. This last has been very evident during the Boer war. Viscount Wolseley has two homes where he may spend the ity for Women. Miss Woolley is tall and slen-

1901 witnesses the retirement of the only man in the navy who ever rose from a gunner's mate to the rank of rear admiral. Captain Nehemiah Mayo Dyer was born in the quaint town of Provincetown in 1839. He was educated in the public schools but the voice of the sea called him and at the age of fourteen he entered the merchant marine. During the Civil War he served a year as a soldier, but in 1862 he was appointed master's mate in the navy. For the daring capture and burning of the Isabel he was made commander of the Glasgow. The end of the war found him with a lieutenant's commission in the regular service. Once during a hurricane in the Pacific he jumped overboard to rescue a sailor. For this brave act he received the medal of the Massachusetts Humane Society and the official commendation of the secretary of the navy. In the battle of Manila, Captain Dyer commanded the Baltimore. A sword was presented to him by the people of the city of Baltimore on his return. Captain Dyer is quiet and unassuming but his magnetic gray eyes show the spirit that has placed him at the top. He is to be retired with the rank of rear admiral but the active service loses one of its most picturesque figures by this retirement.

Edward Strauss with his great orchestra of fifty musicians will be heard in our largest cities during this winter. This is his first visit since 1890 when he visited sixty-one cities of America. Vienna is the foremost musical city of the world and no small part of her fame comes to her through the Strauss family. Johan Strauss, the father of Edward, established the famous orchestra in 1823. His son, Edward, was educated for the consular service and graduated in philosophy. But the love of music was inborn and not to be conquered and in 1862 he became leader of the famous orchestra. For twenty years he has made extended summer tours with his orchestra, and in the last twenty-two years he has visited more than eight hundred cities in the two hemispheres. With his orchestra he has given concerts at fourteen international expositions. Thirtytwo different rulers have given him valuable tokens of their regard. He holds the position of imperial and royal court ball music director of Austria-Hungary. He has published over three hundred of his own compositions and two hundred arrangements of operas.

It is seldom that a college course, a training in practical teaching and the call to the head of a famous school and college are all compassed in the brief space of ten years. Such phenomenal success argues a certain culture and fitness preceding all ley compasses all this achievement. She is the daughter of a Congregational minister and graduated at Wheaton Seminary at Norton, Massachusetts. In 1891 she asked for permission to enter Brown University as a special students. She had a capability for study that became almost genius. She made up the Greek work during the summer, took the regular studies of the sophomore year and the post graduate work in history. She had an active interest in all that pertained to college life and Dr. Andrews predicted that she would find her life work at the head of a woman's college. She once said that one great difference between college men and women was that the girls studied harder while the men thought more. Miss Woolley became instructor in Biblical history at Wellesley College. Her course became very popular and Smith college made her a flattering offer while her old school the Wheaton Seminary called her to its head. She preferred to remain at Wellesley. During this time she was very active in the work of the Rhode Island Women's Committee which raised the money to endow the Brown Univers-eyes. She is domestic in her tastes and prides herself upon her cooking more than she does upon her scholarship. All in all, she seems just the one to preserve the simple wholesome ideals that made Mount Holyoke distinctive, while her ability and scholarly attainment will fit the new and broader life of a college, as Mount Holvoke has become.

An International Yacht Race.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

CUP that will have cost about twenty million dollars at the end of the next inter-national yacht race is national yacht race is certainly a trophy worth the best efforts of every foreign nyachtsman to "lift." The celebrated America cup which was originally won by the yacht of that name off Cowes, England, in 1851 is considered the "Blue ribbon of the Sea" and the highest prize possible for a yacht to win. It is estimated that the entire cost of the events prize possible for a yacht to win. It is estimated that the entire cost of the events which have taken place since the original race has been twently millions of dollars. This cup was the Royal Squadron Cup valued at 100 guineas, or practically $500 in American money.

The fact that this racing, which is really carried on by a dozen or so people who furnish the capital necessary, interests to a greater or less degree all the citizens of our modern civilized countries, renders it the most exciting and best known event in the sporting world. So rapidly does the art of yacht building progress that the champion yacht of the year is seldom heard of thereafter, although her name for the season may be in every one's mouth and labeled upon all kinds of goods and novelties. A recapitulation of these contests is designed to make an American thrill with pride, and just now, when Sir Thomas Lipton has set the yachtsmen on both sides of the Atlantic on the qui vive with another challenge for this year, cannot but prove interesting reading for the subscribers of Comport.

In 1851 England had inaugurated the first successful great World's fair in Crystal Palace in London. The young Queen Victoria and her Prince Consort were the most prominent figures in the world and travel to England had never attained so large a proportion. Among the many events of the year was scheduled the yacht race off Cowes open to yachts of the world, and which promised to attract great attention. The date set was August 22, 1851, and the course set around the Isle of Wight, which was considered unfair to foreigners, for, as the London Times said, it was "notoriously one of the most unfair to strangers that can be selected, inasmuch as the currents and tides render local knowledge of more value than swift.

London Times said, it was "notoriously one of the most unfair to strangers that can be selected, inasmuch as the currents and tides render local knowledge of more value than swift sailing or nautical skill."

During the preceding season the enthusiastic gentlemen connected with the New York Yacht Club had several times talked over the receivable of the content of

Yacht Club had several times talked over the possibility of sending an American yacht over to compete with our British cousins in the proposed races, and the project had generally been favorably considered. The commodore of the club, Mr. John C. Stevens, had learned to admire the work of an apprentice in a shippard, a youth named George Steer. He had designed several local winners and enjoyed in a small way such a reputation as is now given to such way such a reputation as is now given to such designers as Fife and Herreshoff. He was se-lected to design a schooner-yacht for the purpose suggested and produced the America, a schooner 94 feet long and 88 feet on waterline, modeled after a New York pilot boat and hav-

Before going abroad the America was sailed against the Maria, then the smartest Yankee yacht afloat and considerably beaten: but the winner was looked upon merely as a racing machine and such a thing as sending her abroad was not considered for a m o m ent. According ly the America sailed for Havre, arriv-ing there e arly in August 1851, where she immediately fitted out for he Cowe Regatta. She crossed the channel in a dark night and at morn was discovered in the English fleet.

ment; but in a race boats big and little contested. Seventeen boats were entered in this race and fifteen started. At No Man's Land, where the time was first taken, the America was the fifth boat. At the Needles she passed and saluted the Royal Yacht with the Queen on board at which time the second boat, the Aurora, was many miles astern. To quote a poem of that day:

Yarker Poodle had a craft

Yarker Poodle had a craft

Yarker Poodle had a craft

Yankee Doodle had a craft,
A rather tidy clipper,
And be challenged, while they laughed,
The Britishers to whip her.
Their whole squadron she outsped,
And that on their own water;
Of all the lot she went ahead,
And they came nowhere arter. And they came nowhere arter.

Or, as they used to say, "America first; there was no second."

The subsequent history of this yacht is interesting. She was sold to Lord Templeton, who cruised in her for a year and then laid her up at Cowes, where she lay dismantled several years. She was bought for a trifle by another Briton, who had her thoroughly repaired and rechristened Camilla. Sold to some Confederates in Mobile she became a Blockade-runner in our Civil War and known as the Memphis was our Civil War and known as the Memphis was scuttled, after a chase near Florida, to prevent her capture. After the war she was raised and the Government used her for a practice vessel at Annapolis until she was again sold. Since then she has been a cruising yacht of rich men, and at one time was owned by Gen. Benj. F. Butler, to whose family she still belongs.

MR. NAT HERRESHOFF.

In the year 1857 the America's cup was the property of the surviving owners and they made it over by Deed of Gift to the New York Yacht Club, as a perpetual international challenge cup. The first race here was in 1870 when the Cambria came over under Mr. Ashbury as challenger. Some twenty-odd American yachts started in this race which was between the Cambria and the Magic, which won by some forty minutes. The next year Mr. Ashbury again essayed to "lift the cup" with the Livonia, a yacht of 264 tons, which was raced against the Columbia. Two races were won by the latter; but through an accident to her, the Livonia won the third. The Sappho won the fourth and fifth races.

In the year 1876 our Canadian cousins challenged

In 1885 the crack British cutter, Genesta, under Beaver-Webb came over and had a series of races. The yachts Priscilla, Puritan, Gracie and Bedonine entered the trial races and the lot of defence fell to the Puritan after an exciting series in all sorts of weather. After several flukes decisive races were sailed, one of which was the closest on record. The following year the Galatea met the same fate at the hands of the Mayflower, a Boston built boat which did not have near the task that had been cut out for the defender of the previous year. After this came the Volunteer-Thistle races

After this came the Volunteer-Thistle races of 1887. The Volunteer was built in sixty-six days to meet the Scotch cutter and handsomely defeated her. Lord Dunraven then challenged; but not until 1893 were satisfactory negotiations concluded. Then a series of most unsatisfactory races occurred between the Vigilant and the Valkyrie I. The British cutter was easily defeated in the series of races by the Vigilant; but the next year, the same challenger brought over the cutter Valkyrie II. The races were sailed in September, and were won in an unsatisfactory manner by the Yankee yacht. Lord Dunraven's course in this series of races was severely criticised as unsportsmanlike. For the first and only time a challenger returned to England with unpleasant words from this side of the water. The dispute arose from complaints of Lord Dunraven about unfair treatment. Some of his remarks were considered unsportsmanlike and led to much recrimination.

sidered unsportsmanlike and led to much recrimination.

By far the most interesting series of races that have ever been sailed for the cup were the most recent ones in the year 1899, when Sir Thomas Lipton, a wealthy Irishman, known on both sides of the water and who proved himself to be one of the most likeable all around sportsmen ever in America, brought over the Shamrock, which was by far the smartest boat ever turned out on the British side of the water. She raced the Columbia, which was built by Nat Herreshoff; and notwithstanding the weather which was called regular Shamrock weather, the Columbia outsailed, outfooted and outpointed her Irish rival. The victory had been Jiscounted pretty generally in America, and there was not as much enthusiasm as has been usual. This was largely owing to the better fraternal feeling existing between the two countries; but more especially to Sir Thomas proving a good loser, which is the heardest thing in the etheletic the state of the said of the state of the said of the existing between the two countries; but more especially to Sir Thomas proving a good loser, which is the hardest thing in the athletic world. It is undoubtedly true that a large proportion of Americans would have liked to see him had the satisfaction of carrying back the cup, and will have no ill wishes for the present bim had the satisfaction of carrying back the cup, and will have no ill wishes for the present year.

Sir Thomas has again placed a challenge with the New York Yacht Club to be sailed the coming year. He is so satisfied with the fair treatment which he received, and with the excellent arrangements for keeping the course clear, that he insists on sailing the course around New York Harbor, although many yeachtsmen think that better sea and better wind is found off Marblehead or Newport, as the winds are not generally so strong near New York Harbor. This series of races will be sailed early in September, and will be between a new boat being built in England, the Shamrock II, and one which is being constructed by a syndicate of New Yorkers as a defender.

The American boat is to be designed by Mr. Nat Herreshoff at his famous yard at Bristol, R. I. A fact which is not generally understood is that Mr. Nat Herreshoff, who is younger than his brother John, comes from a long line of sailors and boat builders. For a number of years they have scientifically studied out the question of swiftness and resistance, until their yachts are famous in any class for their speed and wave resistance. He is a tall, thin man, with a red beard and stocp, and a very thoughtful face, seldom showing his real feelings. His boats have had the most uniform success since the death of Burgess in Boston, who at that time was the most successful builder in the world. The line of boats which he has constructed is very large, and in their various lines have always stood at the head.

The most remarkable fact about Mr. Herreshoff is that, in a business requiring the greatest judgment, he is blind, and constructs all the details both of planning and figuring without being able to see a single line or figure. The most perplexing calculations in figures are necessary in getting right deductions in this line of work; but Mr. Herreshoff is so gifted that the boat he builds will be fully twenty minutes faster than the Columbia meaning a gain of a minute ception, and says he shall not rest, costly as the trial is, until he has succeeded in carrying away America's cup. There is sure to be plenty of preliminary racing, as the Prince of Wales is to build a racer to compete with the Shamrack and if victor, to take her place for Sir Thomas; while on our own side it seems quite certain that at least four boats will enter the preliminaries, two of them being new, the Gray feather boas have blossomed out here suddenly and seem to be quite the rage though they are an old song in Paris. Very beautiful as well as very costly are the boas and pelerines made of marabout feathers sewed on to a net, many of them having soft, tiny plumes as a finish which largely increase their value.

The universal use of white kid gloves is falling into disfavor, to be superseded by yellow gloves. They are quite popular already among the women who are careful to catch up new things and are quite the thing for street wear as well as for all manner of functions where white ones have formally reigned. However, there is something a trifle too pronounced about the color to seem really suitable except for the more dressy occasions, and they lack the note of harmony the modest white glove always supplies.

The secret of

The secret of success in wear ing flannel night gowns lies in putting the mon over a white one; and, for this purpose a Kimona model is better than any other because of its loose proportions. It is wise to choose pale colors harmonizing with white, and then if the facing down the front, on the big sleeves and the collar are of white the effect is wholly satisfactory. This style is easily made; everything depending upon a good fitting yoke. The skirt requires four straight widths simply hemmed, two in back, two for fronts, and are sloped up so as to give only a moderate fullness when gathered into the yoke. Very pretty ones have as a finish along the edges large scallops embroidered in heavy wash cottons of the same shade. EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: Here we are once more at the beginning of a new year and, as some of our learned men insist, at the opening of a new century. Whether this be so or not I leave to wiser heads than mine to settle. The time, at any rate, has been all our own, and the year which has just come to an end, whether it were the last days of the dying century or the opening ones of the new, held equal opportunities for us to do well or ill. And now another year reaches out to us its three hundred and sixty-five days to be filled by each one with wheat or chaff. Let us see to it, dear friends, that our days are not filled, as Shakespeare has it, with "two grains of wheat to a bushel of chaff," but rather give them each a bushel of wheat to bury the two grains of chaff that will creep in.

I had my first glimpse of the oil region of the United States last summer, but I imagine there are many of the cousins who are not even so fortunate as I, and who will be glad to read the following letter on the subject.

"I wonder how many of us think whence comes the coal oil which fills the lamps by which we sit reading or writing on these long winter evenings, or how it is secured? For myself I never thought much about it until my eyes were opened and my thoughts directed to the subject; but now I want to tell Comport's great family something of these thoughts and observations.

"Any visitor to the little city of Bluffton will remember it especially for its being almost the center of a great many oil farms.

"The method of working these farms is intensely interesting. The land is leased of the farmers by great oil companies and a gang of men is set to work to build derricks for the purpose of drilling holes into the earth. These derricks are about seventy-five feet high, and are very much like great oil companies and a gang of men is set to work to build derricks for the purpose of drilling holes into the earth. These derricks are about seventy-five feet high, and are very much like wind-mill or artesian well derricks, only on a larger scale. When the derricks are finished a hole is drilled in each well to a depth of from fitteen hundred to eighteen hundred feet and about eight inches in diameter. The work of drilling is carried on by night as well as by day, two men working upon it by night and two by day, and each gang having a tool dresser, or a man who keeps the tools in good shape.

"It takes about eighteen days to drill a hole to a depth of fifteen hundred feet, and when it is completed all the tools are taken out and about two hundred pounds of nitro-glycerine are lowered to the bottom of the hole. Then a three-cornered piece of iron, called a 'Go-Devil', is dropped into the well. When this 'Go-Devil' strikes the nitro-glycerine it causes an awful explosion which tears up the stone for several feet around the hole and makes a vent for the oil. In a few minutes oil, salt water and pieces of stone begin to shoot up out of the well, sometimes to a height of two or three hundred feet. This makes a pretty sight, as may can pump twenty-five wells. The oil is pumped into big iron tanks, and is then measured by a man called a gauger. Every farmer is entitled to one-sixth of the oil on his farm, and hence it must be carefully measured. After this the oil is run out of the tanks through pipes to the big refineries, where it is converted into coal oil. When the oil first comes from the well it is almost black, and it is then called crude oil, or petroleum.

"It is difficult to give, within the limits of a short letter, a detailed account of this interesting and instructive subject. One needs to see these wells in operation to fully understand and appreciate them." LOUELLA SPENCE, Pass Christian, Miss.

entertainment for these long winter evenings, and I am quite sure that many of the cousins will be glad to try it.

"I recently visited in a family where there were two exceedingly bright girls, one of whom is a student at Radeliffe, and one of the odd bits of entertaining they did one evening, before a room full of friends, was so delightful and yet so easily done, that I am sure the cousins will be glad to know about it, with a view to doing the same thing sometime, under like circumstances.

"One of the girls dressed herself in a full, blue cheesecloth skirt, that fastened around the neck and hung straight down to her wrists. On her hands were white stockings and white kid slippers, thus making very good-looking feet. On her head was a big, flaring bonnet, with many flowers, and tied under the chin with wide ties of blue cheese cloth. She then stood behind a table, which had a cloth over it and so concealed the rest of her body, that only that part showed which came above the table as she stood behind it. Of course this use of her hands, which rested on the table, left her without any arms,—but behind her, with a dark cloak entirely over her so that she was not at all noticeable, stood the other girl, who thrust her arms, which had on sleeves of the blue cheesecloth, from behind, in such a way as to look exactly as though they were the arms of the girl standing upright behind the table. Then this girl repeated, in a spirited manner, 'The Jabberwock' from 'Alice in Wonderiand', and the girl behind used her hands in a most marvelous manner, considering the fact that she of course couldn't see what she was doing. She had to gesticulate to suit the other one's words,—to put her hand to the other one's ear, as though listening, and to keep her hands in constant motion, and she did it so well that it really seemed as though all done by one queer little woman, who had the ordinary sized head, shoulders and arms, but tiny feet, and seemed to be less than half as tall as the ordinary sized head, shoulders and arms, w

Now we have an account of a very curious custom of the Sac & Fox Indians, written by a lady who evidently knows whereof she speaks. She who evidently knows whereof she speaks. She says:

"A family among the Sac & Fox Indians never grows less, for as soon as one member dies a member of some other family is adopted in the deceased one's place. The ceremony is about as follows:

"The family of the deceased selects some one, generally near the age of the dead person, and asks permission to adopt him. Usually the request is granted, for it is considered an honor to be chosen. The supper, called the dead feast supper, is prepared, according to the means of the adopting party, and clothes are also prepared for the new member. Often the dying one has left two complete suits, all beaded and trimmed with silver buckles, one in which to be buried and one for the adopted one. The girl (if it is a girl who is being adopted one. The girl (if it is a girl who is being adopted one. The girl (if it is a girl who is being adopted one. The girl (if it is a girl who is being adopted in her best, bought often at great sacrifice. They show her the supper prepared and she goes out and invites in as many as she thinks sufficient for the food provided. They sit down in a circle around the campfire and a member of the family takes a piece of bread and breaks it in as many pieces as there are dead in their family, and going around the fire drops a piece for each one dead and mentions the name as she drops it. She does the same with everything provided for the supper. Then the guests are served.

"After eating a mat is laid in the midst of the company and the young girl is led to it, her clothes taken off and new ones put on. When the family is able the clothes are often very costly, being all beaded and trimmed with ribbons. The hair is tied with colored ribbons and beaded moccasins and leggins are put on. When completely dressed she is led to the door, where she finds a pony saddled and trimmed with ribbons and bright-colored calico. These she pulls off and throws them to the cowd who scramble for them. She rides about half a mile towards the setting sun and then return

It had been previously used for herding the cattle from the Indians and for confining the slaves brought from the coast of Africa, before they would be sold from the block on the bluff of the Potomac. It is a picturesque looking spot which would furnish a subject for an artist and material for a novelist. The Braddock house which surrounds this old mansion was at one time used as a sub-treasury. The first note ever issued by the United States was printed here and is still on exhibition to visitors."

In a poke, but did you ever hear a Pig Sing? Well, this Musical Pig right from the Paris Exposition, is the latest and greatest wonder out. More fun with this cute little porker than anything ever invented. You simply blow him up like the picture here while he squeals, then collapses, then gives up the ghost with a last faint grunt and finally dies. Everything about the tragic ending is so laughable, however, that you nearly burst with hilarity, so funny is the ending of poor Pigy. Thousands of these Musical lying Pigs were sold in Paris at the Exposition this season and they are now all the rage in New York. Don't fail to get one if you want some fun. They are strongly made of a thin rubber substance so you can carry them in your vest pocket and suddenly blow him up and then there is more fun ahead than a box of monkeys. Just get one and try it. A Long Automobile Trip.

UT of the two millions or more readers of COMFORT, I fancy not many have taken the trip from New York, trip from New York, the greatest city in the land, to Washington, its capital, and back again by automobile, the coming vehicle of the new times. Indeed, I am sure that not a great number have done so, because out of all the seventy as we milbecause out of all the seventy-seven millions of people in the United States only four have gone the round. These are Mr. George I. Scott, of New York, Captain Frank P. Avery of the army, Dr. W. H. Stemmerman of Passaic, N. J., and the writer. Mr. Edward Weston of Washington has made the trip one way.

It is of the run made in October by Dr. Stemmerman and the writer that I wish to tell ComFORT readers, and wish at the same time that so pleasant and interesting a journey may fall to their lot some day. It will not come to all of them, of course, just as it has not come to all to make the trip by railway, which is now the old-fashioned and long established method of travel, but for the few of us who have gone over the road now, there will be thousands, for the automobile has come to stay and in a few years it will be commoner than horses and buggies it will be commoner than horses and buggies now are, because it will cost less and get there so much quicker.

We left Passaic, a New Jersey suburb of New York, one bright October morning at half past ten o'clock, with only just enough baggage hooked on behind to do us for the trip, and headed for Washington, two hundred and fifty miles away, like a pair of sailors on an unknown sea, for the two persons who had preceded us had left no maps to go by. New Jersey roads are fine, something that adds very materially to comfortable automobiling, and we flew along all the morning, stopping only to get water for our boiler at a farmhouse by the way. The reader will understand that our auto was a steam wagon, carrying twenty-one gallons of reader will understand that our auto was a steam wagon, carrying twenty-one gallons of water, which on good roads will supply the boiler for twenty miles, and we carried six gallons of gasoline for fuel, which is supposed to last for sixty miles or more, according to the drafts made on it by the roads. You will see therefore, that an automobile must be watered as often as a horse, though it drinks more, and it must have its feeding of gasoline every five or six hours, according to the speed it is run. Water costs nothing but gasoline is worth at least fifteen cents a gallon, so that feed is no small item of expense.

water costs nothing but gasoline is worth at least fifteen cents a gallon, so that feed is no small item of expense.

We were riding entirely for pleasure and so we jogged along at about ten miles an hour, admiring the beautiful country we were passing through, taking an hour off for dinner and stopping at night in Princeton, N. J., the home of Princeton College and ex-President Cleveland. We had made fifty-one miles for our first day's run and were quite satisfied. The next day we passed through Trenton, the capital of New Jersey, and here crossed the Delaware river into Pennsylvania, where before we had gone half a mile we came upon a sandy road, and for twenty miles or more it was not as much delight to automobile as it had been in New Jersey. We had to pay toll, too, as bad as the road was, and we were charged as a two-horse vehicle, though the sharpest-eyed tollgate keeper could not find a horse anywhere on our premises. You see the automobile is so new that its real place has not yet been found. We reached Philadelphia in plenty of time to have gone on a dozen or more miles, but a rain came on suddenly and we went under cover for the night. Rain makes mud and mud is something no automobilist cares to meet. Hard, hilly roads the auto can get over without great difficulty, but muddy roads and sandy ones are what it is most afraid of.

Leaving Philadelphia by fairly good roads, we came to Chester in Rennsylvania and Wilmington in Delaware, in both of which cities we were chased through the streets by crowds of school children as if they had never seen such a thing as an automobile, and I presume some of them never had. It was the great delight of the boys to race with it, but we soon ran away from them and they dropped behind us much astonished at our speed. Shortly after leaving Wilmington we came into the region of less population and travel and the roads became almost bad in places. The horses, too, that we met began to show more signs of dislike to the strange wagon among them, and we had to stop frequently to let teams go by. The people along the way were also quite curious, and they ran out of their houses or stopped at their work in the fields to watch us as we went their work in the fields to watch us as we went flying along. Sometimes we were stopped by the more curious who wanted to see what kind of a machine we had anyhow. At five o'clock in the evening we had reached Elkton, a pretty little town in Maryland, and here we were met by most of the colored population who gathered about us ten rows deep when we stopped in front of the hotel. We were up early next morning because we had learned that the road beyond for ten miles was very bad, and we wanted to get through with it as early as possible. It was even worse than we had been told and twice the hills were so sandy one of us had to get out and walk. But not for any long distance, and getting over it at last we went on a good stretch and fairly flew into Perryville, on the Susquehanna, where we crossed the river on a flat car of the Pennsylvania road and hurried on to Baltimore. But our hurry did not last long for our pump began to refuse to work, and after bothering with it for three or four miles, we hailed a teamster and had him tow us into Aberdeen, and this is one of the things an automobilist hates worse than anything else. We did not get away from Aberdeen until next morning about eight o'clock with seventy miles before us to Washington, and how we did get along the pike to Baltimore. An hour and a half in Maryland's chief city and we left for the National Capital, understanding that we were to have a pretty good road, as Mr. Weston had made the dislittle town in Maryland, and here we were met Baltimore. An hour and a half in Maryland's chief city and we left for the National Capital, understanding that we were to have a pretty good road, as Mr. Weston had made the distance from Washington, about forty miles, in two hours and twenty minutes. But we did not make it in that time owing to the fact that the worst road we had yet come over was the one we took, and both of us had to get out and push while the auto used all its power to pull itself out of the level sand bed called a highway. But perseverance and elbow grease overcome a world of difficulties and we got onto hard ground once more, and at half past five we were before the great dome of the capitol at Washington, half of our undertaking accomplished and both of us feeling as well as could be expected under the circumstances. We had traveled two hundred and seventy miles from Monday morning to Saturday evening, and had averaged about ten miles an hour for our running time. Not equal to the locomotive quite, but considerably better than our natural competitor, the horse, could possibly have competitor, the horse, could possibly have

On Sunday morning we went by auto over into Virginia to see the National Cemetery at Arlington, where nearly twenty thousand dead soldiers are buried, and then after a spin about soldiers are buried, and then after a spin about all the public buildings in the city we started away on our return. To avoid the bad road to Baltimore we went by way of Frederick, Md., once the home of Barbara Frietchie and of Francis Scott Key, the author of "The Star Spangled Banner" both of whom are now buried there, and just out of Washington on a fine piece of down grade road we made our best time, getting over the ground for a short distance at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. But such a speed is not pleasant, for the wind is a gale and all kinds of specks and bugs floating in the air get into the eyes or strike wind is a gale and all kinds of specks and bugs floating in the air get into the eyes or strike one in the face like pinpoints; but five miles from Frederick our pump went bad again, and that last five miles dragged along slowly enough, but we made it without having to be towed and there was a good deal of consolation in that. At Frederick we stayed two days for repairs and because one day (Col. Bryan was there that day also,) it rained steadily all day. The next morning we were off in good time, and over a good pike through a country as fair as Canaan, we ran to Emmittsburg in Maryland, where we took dinner. Along this road ours was the first automobile to have come and we created as much of a sensation as a road ours was the first automobile to have come and we created as much of a sensation as a circus, although before the astonished people could realize what we were we had flown out of sight up the road. Not long after leaving Emmitsburg for Gettysburg we passed out of Maryland into Pennsylvania, and for ten miles we had a stretch of rough road that would make the mildest tempered driver of a team of mules swear. To add to our discomfort we ran out of gasoline, and once more had to get a tow in order to reach Gettysburg. It was early yet, and as soon as we had our fuel aboard we set to ride over the greatest battlefield of the war between the states. The government has laid out all over it fine avenues as smooth as the floor and it was worth all our trouble to fly over these beautiful stretches of road. It was out all over it fine avenues as smooth as the floor and it was worth all our trouble to fly over these beautiful stretches of road. It was strange, too, to ride over this field in an auto, because when the battle was fought such a vehicle as ours was not in existence.

Leaving Gettysburg next day at noon, we ran on to York, Pa., through a country lovely to look at and to be in, meeting with a punctured tire on the trip. We made it up next day, however, by the longest one, seventy-seven miles, stopping for the night in one of the suburban towns of Philadelphia. By noon, for the roads are almost perfect about Philadelphia, we had gone into the big town, staid an hour and a half and were out again on our way to Trenton, over that same piece of sandy road which had not become any better during our absence. That night we were in Princeton, where we had spent our first night out, and we began to feel as if we were not only getting home again, but were glad of it. Not that everything wasn't as lovely as it could be, but human beings are likely to tire of even the best of things. We had an early start from Princeton on Sunday morning, the weather being muggy and not agreeable, but we had got used to weather, and we went tripping along as light as a fairy, making ten miles an hour on to weather, and we went tripping along as light as a fairy, making ten miles an hour on the worst road, and fifteen over the best, and we landed in Passaic at just one o'clock having made the run of fifty-one miles in about four hours, two hours better than we made on our trip out, though we did not stop coming back to dinner.

At the end we stepped from our vehicle, which had made six hundred and eleven miles since its departure, not any the worse for the which had made six hundred and eleven messince its departure, not any the worse for the wear, though the Doctor was a little gladder to be home than I was, for he had been running his own machine all the way, and it is no small job to do that over all kinds of roads. In fact there is no kind of locomotive more trying on the newes them is automobilize to the men in the nerves than is automobiling to the man in charge. The Doctor was extremely careful, and that he had made the run without accident and that he had made the run without accident was the best proof of his devotion to duty.

Some day automobiling will be within the reach of as many people as now own horses and buggies, or more, and it well deserves to be, for there cannot be a more exhilarating, interesting and healthful manner of taking the air and seeing the country at close range than this. The cheapest auto now costs $750, and from that to $3,000, and they are not yet perfect, but they will be improved, and prices will get lower in time, so that persons of ordinary means will have them, and whoever does will bless the man who invented automobiles.

HEALTH AND WEALT

BOOK

The seeming mysterious force which was originated into a science by Prof. H. C. Murphy, President of the American Institute of Science, and was named by him and now known throughout the entire world as MAGNETIC HEAL ING, gives its students the power to control the body and mind of others; also the power to dispel disease as if by magic. It is the grandest pain reliever known to man; it is the only sure road to success financially, physically, socially and politically. With this wonderful power, health, fame and riches can be obtained; also the affections of those you love. You learn this wonderful science at home. The only education necessary is the knowledge to read. The mail course which is sent to all, makes you efficient in each branch of this grand science. Through the knowledge you gain you are able, without the use of drugs or the surgeon's knife, to

as well as those about you. There are many people, both men and women, who shrink from the embarrassment of making their diseases public, and on this account go through the world suffering tortures and pain, but through this method you are able to HEAL YOURSELF IN THE PRIVACY OF YOUR OWN HOME, and in a few days you are in the sunshine of health to the surprise of your acquaintances. Many a modest woman suffering untold agony from diseases peculiar to her sex, has gone to a premature grave rather than subject herself to the embarrassment of an examination. The same can be said of men suffering from indiscretions that they were ashamed to confess. This grand method permits sufferers of both sexes to do away with this embarrassment, for by it they cure themselves without the assistance of anyone, of every disease and infirmity. THE BOOK OF HOPE, written by Prof. Murphy, in a plain and concise manner tells you exactly how you can gain this wonderful influence whereby you become proficient in curing disease and babits in yourself and in others; develop mental energy, gratify ambition and your every wish; also gives you the key to personal and social successes and teaches you the GRANDEST AND BEST PAYING PROFESSION OF THE AGE, as it is an acknowledged fact that there is no profession known to-day where independence can be so easily gained as through this grand-profession. RETEMBER, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday the realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address and you will receive this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, labor has been spared. It has numerous and elegant illustrations, and is a token which anyone may be proud of. Remember, it costs you nothing, and with it you receive the Magnetic Record, a 36-page illustrated magazine. Thousands who have become successful through this mail course, write similar letters to these:

Rev. S. P. Freyberger, Goshen, Ind., writes: "Your course will enable the student to practice the Art of Healing as soon as the course is completed. Having practiced Magnetic Healing for a year past, and having been very successful, I thank you most heartily for the knowledge I received from a study of your mail course." Dr. E. Pritchard, Luling, Texas, writes: "I would not take $500 for your course and do without it. I had catarrh of the head, and also constipation, of several years standing, and have cured myself of both diseases. I have also cured every person I have treated." The field of Magnetic Healing is as broad as the world itself. It brings wealth, health, happiness and influence.

BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

EVERAL times I have written of the use of bicycles to the army, but the employment of bicycle soldiers in the South African war has practically been the first thorough test which has been made in actual warfare of the bicycle as an adjunct to a military force. In the United States, however, drills have been carried on with bicycles, in which some remarkable feats have been performed. In addition to the usual drills, flag movements, etc., as carried on by infantry, the wheelmen, with their rifles and other equipment, have made forced marches, taking their mounts through woodland and marsh, have scaled fences and accomplished other feats which it would be impossible to accomplish with a force of cavalry. A few years ago a squad of cadets EVERAL times I have written of the fences and accomplished other feats which it would be impossible to accomplish with a force of cavalry. A few years ago a squad of cadets from the Northwestern Military Academy at Chicago, made a forced march from Chicago to Washington. More than half of the time it rained or snowed, so that the road for wagon use at many points was impassable. The cyclists made the trip in much shorter period than a squad of cavalry, although for a considerable distance they were obliged to carry their wheels on their backs.

Since that time several companies have been formed in the National Guard of Illinois, largely on the system devised by Major R. P. Davidson, of Chicago, who has made a study of the bicycle in warfare. The commands have been taught to ride over rough roads and to go over tree stumps and branches without losing their balance. As a result they can ride their wheels in places where it would be impossible for any one to do so without special instructions. They can load and fire their rifles while in the saddle, using both hands to manipulate the gun. Their double quick movement consists in performing the bayonet exercise with one hand on the double quick movement consists in performing the bayonet exercise with one hand on the handlebar and the other handling the gun at handlebar and the other handling the gun at the usual position of "charged bayonets." In this way they can move down upon the imag-inary enemy faster than a troop of cavalry. They have been drilled in skirmish movements and attacking an enemy in open order, by ad-vancing rapidly with the bicycles, springing off and then lying flat on their faces in the usual manner.

These cyclist soldiers carry a rifle of the regulation size, also a blanket, knapsack and ammunition. Altogether, their load when on the wheel averages nearly forty pounds, yet they have no difficulty in mounting and dismounting, and can travel at a rate of sixty to seventy-five miles daily on a fair road without fatigue, while during their marches across the country they have frequently covered a distance of thirty to forty miles daily.

One of the most remarkable evolutions is the scaling of a wall or high fence with the wheels. The order is given to dismount. The bicycles are placed on the ground, and the front row of men climb on the shoulders of the second row. Pulling themselves to the top of the wall their own wheels are handed to them and then those of the second row. A part of the men on top of the wall jump down to the other side, and the wheels are handed to them. All of the bi-gun holds its own with the other branch of the service as far as speed is concerned. The carriage mounts a 7-mm. Colt automatic rapid fire gun, shooting four hundred and eighty shots a minute, and having a range of one hundred and eighty degrees right and left. The weight of the gun is about forty pounds, that of the tripod and mount fifty-four pounds, making the total weight ninety-four pounds. It uses smokeless ammunition only, and has an effective range of two thousand yards. The carriage has a six horse power gasoline motor, with a bullet-proof gasoline tank sufficient to carry fuel for two hundred miles. There is a windlass attachment to the engine, to which a rope may be fastened and the engine practically lifts its own weight clear, enabling it to pull itself up the steepest bank and up to elevated positions, where horses would be unable to find foothold. The carriage is also equipped with two large solar acetylene lamps, which make it as easy to run at night as in the day time. The carriage will carry four persons, with tents, blankets and from twenty-five hundred to five thousand rounds of ammunition, if desired. The facilities for carrying the ammunition can be increased if desired. A detachable steel shield is used to protect the gunners.

Brighton, England, writes: I saw a number of ingenious new cycle attachments and some altogether new devices in the way of military cycles. That which struck me as the most novel, and possibly the most useful of all, was the armored bicycle. It is a solid-tired machine, into the front wheels of which, within the spokes, Harveyized steel plate, which is proof against rifle-fire with service ammunition from three hundred to three hundred and fifty yards, is inserted. When laid down and the handle-bars resting on the ground, it forms a perfect screen for the rifleman, as shown in the accompanying photograph. A powerful intrenching tool, which is held in position with a thumb-screw, forms a rear wheel mud guard. The armored bicycle weighs less than fifty pounds and is by no means unsightly. It is the invention of Weyley, Lord of Walmer.

The last file are pulled over by grasping the hands of their comrades, or, sometimes, if the distance is too great, one set of men hang from the wall by their hands; each is supported by others on the top, and the last ones to come over catch those hanging by the feet, and are pulled up in this way.

As the area of man's life is broadened so is his thought. The daily area of our lives is much greater than that of our forefathers. We see in an hour what they saw in a day. The telescope has extended our power of vision many fold; the telegraph and telephone our powers of speech and hearing; steam and electricity our power and means of locomotion, and now comes the self-contained bicycle which in a marvelous multifold way is happily aiding the daily area of life and thought.

And what has the bicycle done for education? Since those who are generally accepted as the best and the truest thinkers of the world agree with Wordsworth that what shall we say of the mighty influence of the bicycle that has brought field and forest, mount and meadow, as an open book, to be read by thousands who without its happy aid never would have found

HAVE YOU ASTHMA IN ANY FORM?

Medical Science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma in every form in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanic discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair, being unable to lie down night or day from Asthma. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of Comfort, who suffers from any form of Asthma. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

When I say I cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Post Office.

Janus the two-faced God looked both forward and back. His month furnishes the same chance to thoughtless humanity.

"Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof." The end of the year and the end of the century give a chance to test the proverb. Let us be optimistic enough to hope that the progress of the New Year and the new century may tend to prove it a true saying.

It is claimed that among some state documents unearthed at Pekin papers have been found which prove the Chinese to have been the discoverers of America. The students of the pre-historic period of American history have entertained the idea that the early inhabitants of America came by way of Behring Strait. The evidences of an advanced civilization among the dwellers in Mexico, Central and South America bear out this theory Much that is obscure, much reasoning or guess work as to the early inhabitants would be explained by the fact of Chinese discovery. It was current opinion at the time of the Spanish-American war that Spain had made her greatest mistake when she discovered America. China can hardly be reproved for her enterprise in that manner for present indications show that the United States is likely to be her best friend.

Mark Twain's recent bout with a New York "cabby" drew from the humorist the statement that Americans were too careless of their own rights. He claimed that it was not only the right and privilege of American citizens to ."kick" but also their duty. A New Year Resolution. "Mem. To kick when kicking is a public virtue." Now that is a general proposition which will fill the year full of excitement. The idea that public good may be increased at the sacrifice of private peace has the merit of truth but the busy down trodden American has counted the physical wear and tear and exhaustion of nervous energy necessary to accomplish minor reform and has concluded that the game was not worth the candle. So he pays robber cab rates, high taxes, poor service and high tips. He gives up his money and often his comfort because after all it is easier than to fight for his rights. But in the lively way that Mark Twain states it he is not living up to the idea of a good citizen. There are plenty of windmills in the world and the Don Quixotes of the noble army of kickers will find them all whirling if they make the New Year Resolution "To kick when kicking is a public virtue."

The discussion over the commencement of a new century seemed to exhaust itself last year. Nineteen hundred passed without a protest as to whether it was the end of the old century or the beginning of the new. As far as church authority can settle disputes, the matter has been settled, for at midnight on the thirty-first of December the Pope celebrated high mass for the close of the century. The century opened with the gigantic political upherval of the French Revolution. All Europe was shaken hy the outbreak of democratic ideas and slowly but surely during the century the political ideas have changed until absolute rule is an outgrown theory in government. One hundred years ago the monarchial governments of Europe were trembling before the advance of the French armies and the consequent breaking down of the old ideas of government. The new century begins with the allied forces of Europe arrayed against the oldest representabut surely during the century the political tive of absolute rule—China. The end of the old—the beginning of the new suggest scores of comparisons along the lines of political, social and economic changes. The broad outlook whether it be towards the future or the past has steadying effect upon humanity. Such a great dividing line as the passing from one century to another emphasizes the idea of the pause to look over the past in order to improve the future.

Rican Policy, The First Movement towards Expansion, The Breakdown of the Old Colonial System in Canada and British Rule in Canada. Each subject is given by a man of special strength on that individual topic. The list will draw out a discussion of most of the difficult problems connected with our present position as a colonial nation. No more important contributions towards to difficulties of administration could be given. For that reason the meeting and work of the Historical Association has a vital interest to all Americans.

A new republic calling itself Acre is seeking recognition from the United States. It has sent its first minister to the United States. The Republic of Acre is in the forest land of Brazil and consists of a community of about 20,000 souls engaged in the rubber industry. It has been founded by a rich Brazilian rubber merchant. The territory of the new republic lies partly within Brazil and partly in Bolivia. Both nations have resisted the effort of Acre te establish its independence but without success. Its representative claims that it is as firmly established as any South American republic and more firmly than many of the Latin American states as Acre is an Anglo-Saxon community. The spirit of the little community recalls two like incidents in American his-American states as Acre is an Anglo-Saxon community. The spirit of the little community recalls two like incidents in American history. Vermont was claimed by both New York and New Hampshire. During the troubled period from 1781 to 1789 it maintained an independent government. Its delegates were not seated in the congress of the Confederation and as it refused to submit to the laws or claims of New York or New Hampshire it was a tiny republic governed by its own constitution. Three counties of North Carolina also organized themselves as the State of Franklin and under that name sent a delegate to ask for recognition from Congress. The Republic of Acre need not lack historical precedpublic of Acre need not lack historical precedence as to its size and desire for liberty.

The "short session" of Congress that convened in December faced some of the most important problems ever presented to Congress. A reduction of the Stamp tax is promised. Our new Colonial possessions and the phenomenal growth of the trade and commerce of the United States indicate the pressing and paramount importance of two measures that must be determined by this Congress, i. e., the Isthmian Canal and the Marine Subsidy Bill. Our business interest now importantly described. be determined by this Congress, i. e., the Isthmian Canal and the Marine Subsidy Bill. Our business interests now imperatively demand a short route from our great Eastern cities to the Philippines. It is not now a theory about possible trade with the Orient but an actual condition, whose problems are best solved by a canal across the Isthmus and a canal owned and controlled by the United States. When the nineteenth century was young the United States was the great carrying nation of the world. When the Embargo Act, the Force Act and the Non Intercourse Act aroused the wrath of New England, all the business interest of that section lay in its ships. We were a trading nation and not a manufacturing nation. One by one the Colonial powers began to enforce laws similar to the old Navigation Laws of England, and insisted that these colonies should ship goods only in the ships sailing under the national flag. The final blow to our carrying business came during the War of 1812, when Great Britain attempted to enforce the "Rule of 1756" and said that a nation which did not permit a foreign ship to carry goods from a colony to the mother country in time of peace could not be allowed to secont such serious and the secont such serious and the secont such serious country in time of peace could not be allowed to secont such serious carry such serious carry such serious carry in the serious country in time of peace could not be allowed to secont such serious carry in the serious country in time of peace could not be allowed to secont such serious carry in the serious carry did not permit a foreign ship to carry goods from a colony to the mother country in time of peace could not be allowed to accept such service in time of war, even though the neutral ship carried neutral goods. The War of 1812 showed how rapidly we were growing able to dispute England's right to the proud title of Mistress of the Seas. In spite of that fact the American Navy and Merchant Marine has steadily declined. We have made phenomenal progress in the manufacture of goods to send, while we have steadily decreased in the ability to carry our own products in American ships. to carry our own products in American ships. Other nations have shown a generous spirit towards ship builders and have given subsidies to encourage ship building. Now that our col-onies are distant thousands of miles we must either send American goods in American ships or allow other nations to reap the benefit of our short-sighted policy. The industrial pros-perity of our nation rests largely upon the fate of these two important bills.

The American Historical Association closed its sixteenth annual meeting at Detroit on the last of December. The American Economic Association held joint sessions with the Historial Association. Association held joint sessions with the Historical Association. The meeting continued from Thursday to Saturday and much that is of permanent and practical value was discussed. The places of meeting were alternately at the University of Michigan at Ann Harbor and in Detroit. These two societies are essentially learned bodies, their membership comprising the greatest scholars and students of the country along these lines of work. A portion of their work is therefore of general interest only to students or specialists. A list of the more important committees will illustrate the special field of the Historical Association. The committees include Historical Manuscript to Commission, Committee on Justice Winsor prize which is given to the best original work of the year, Board of Editors of American prize which is given to the best original work of the year. Board of Editors of American Historical Review, Bibliographical Committee, Public Archives Commission, Committee on Monographic History of America, and on Unifying of the Public Repositions at Washington. The greatest importance of this work to the plain average citizen is the fact of bringing expert and trained specialists to the discussion of questions that are vital to the nation's well being. There was a time when the college professor and the learned student were considered to be too far removed from practical affairs to have any practical grapy were considered to be too far removed from practical affairs to have any practical grasp upon matters of every day national life. We are getting over this idea as the nation outgrows its childhood and reaches a portion where its problems of government can not be solved without an accurate knowledge of the intricate affairs involved. Men of prominence in special lines of historical and economic study are called to assist the government. Our recent Commissions like the Venezuela Commission and the Commission to the Philippines to all Americans.

The Christian Endeavorers.

One of the largest bodies of workers affiliated with the Protestant church is the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, which formidable name is shortened in common usage to Christian Endeavorers. The order was first started by the President, Rev. Frances E. Clark, a Baptist minist.r, at Portland, Maine, February 2, 1881, for the purpose of training a number of young people to the duties of church membership. It has so much beauty and is so easy to cultivate and so sure to bloom that I place it first on the long list of bulbs adapted to house culture. The bulbs are so small that as many as half a dozen bulbs should be placed in a five-inch pot. As to soil, that composed of one half good loam and the other half of leaf-mold, sand and rotted manure will give you the best soil for the freesia. The bulbs can be potted any time from August to October, but early potting is desirable for several reasons. Set the bulbs deep enough in the pot to have their sharp-pointed tips covered about a quarter of an inch. Press the soil down quite firmly around the bulbs, water thoroughly and set them away in a dark place for the roots to form and leaves to push their way up through the soil. Some flower growers do not put the freesia bulbs away in the dark but set them in a shaded place in the window garden, but those who have tried both methods think that they get better results when the bulbs have formed their roots and sent out their leaf tips in the dark. The freesia likes a good deal of water and a low temperature. If possible keep it where the temperature does not rise above sixty-five. Its flowers come in long and extermely graceful spikes. They have delicious fragrance, and they remain in bloom for nearly a week. A single pot of freesias will give a delightful fragrance to a large room. Never allow the soil in the pots to become dry. The freesia must have plenty of moisture or it will be a failure.

The Hyacinth is a bulb that must be set

The Hyacinth is a bulb that must be set away in the dark for the roots to form, and the The Hyacinth is a bulb that must be set away in the dark for the roots to form, and the first sharp points of green to show through the soil. They will not bloom if they are not given this preparatory treatment. The soil used for freesias will also do for the hyacinth, but not more than one large bulb should be put in a five or six-inch pot. One sometimes sees the hyacinth growing and blooming in water, but this method of cultivation is not recommended as best for the amateur. You will be far more certain to succeed if you grow the bulbs in soil. Roman hyacinths are just the thing for a window garden. They send up several spikes of flowers from each bulb and their fragrance is more delicate than that of the other hyacinths. They come into bloom so rapidly that bulbs potted in September or October ought to give one flowers for Christmas. The Roman hyacinths, like their Dutch cousins, come in all tints and cousins, come in all tints and colors. They bloom freely and are sure to give satis-faction.

A bulb not in very general cultivation is the Orinthe-galum arabi-cum. Its cul-ture is exactly like that of the h y a c i n t h. Three bulbs can be placed in a six-inch pot. From each bulb there should come a long, slender stem sometimes twenty inches in length surmounted by a great cluster of milk-white flowers each having a jet-black center. This very striking flower remains in bloom longer than any bulbous plant of which I have knowledge, particularly if the plant is kept in a cool room. It must be confessed that the Ornithegalum is a little uncertain about blooming, but if one pots five or six bulbs one can reasonably expect some of them to bloom, and a single cluster of this striking flower repays one for the loss of four or five bulbs that fail to do their duty.

The Chinese Lily is a bulb of such common and simple growth that it is hardly necessary to give directions for its culture. Some of my readers, however, may not know that all that is needed for the cultivation of this lily is a dish containing an inch or two of pebbles. Place the bulbs on the pebbles, put other pebbles around them to support them, keep the dish filled with water and the bulbs will start into immediate and rapid growth. One can start these bulbs into growth at any time. Their yellow and white flowers are very pretty but their odor is not very agreeable.

The Giant White Narcissus is another bulb that can be grown in water just as one grows From each bulb there should come a long, slender stem their odor is not very agreeable.

The Giant White Narcissus is another bulb that can be grown in water just as one grows the Chinese lily, or the bulbs may be potted in soil. The writer tried a dozen bulbs each way last year, and the results were precisely the same with the exception of the fact that the bulbs potted in soil were stockier and the flowers remained in bloom longer than the flowers of those grown in water.

I am sure that more Easter lilies would be grown in our homes if all who so admire this beautiful flower only knew how easily it might be cultivated. There are those who think that it cannot be grown outside of a greenhouse, but one of the finest Easter lilies I ever saw was grown by an old lady in her kitchen. If you wish a succession of these flowers pot the bulbs to begin with. If the bulbs are light and spongythey are not in good condition. Get bulbs that are heavy and solid. Avoid the bargain counters of department stores when you are buying bulbs. It is far safer to buy of regular and reliable dealers. Put one large bulb in a deep eight or nine-inch pot. Put the bulb far enough down in the pot so that it can be covered out of sight and two or three inches of soil added as the stem shoots up. This is necessary for the support of the plant. Be sure and set the pot away in the dark to form roots. The Easter lily requires a rich soil. It is also imperative that the pot have good drainage, and about two inches of broken crockery should be placed in the bottom of the pot to secure this necessary drainage. Liquid manure should be given when the buds begin to appear. Keep in a low temperature, and there is no reason why you should not have perfect success with this flower.

It is possible to grow tulips in the house, but the chances of success are less than with other bulbs, and I should advise the amateur to let the tulip alone. It is difficult to secure for it the degree of moisture in the atmosphere that it requires to bring it to perfection.

Jonquils and the crocus can be grown without any trouble. They should be given the same treatment given the hyacinth. The calla lily is an easily grown plant, one of its imperative requisites being an unfailing abundance of water. Three bulbs of the calla can be put into a ten-inch pot, and it is more satisfactory to pot three bulbs together than it is to pot the bulbs singly. Like the Easter lily the calla is a high feeder, and it should have very rich soil with the addition of liquid manure during the blooming season. A lover of the calla who has the finest plants and flowers. I have ever seen says th be cultivated. There are those who think that but one of the finest Easter lilies I ever saw was grown by an old lady in her kitchen. If you warm water every morning. It is her belief, resulting from long experience, that the calla sends out more and finer flowers when watered with hot water. Of course the water is not hot enough to injure the roots. She is careful to tell her friends that if they begin watering their callas with hot water they must keep it up. It will not do to use hot water one morning and cold water the next. The hot water also has a tendency to make the plants quite tender, and they must not be allowed to suffer great changes in temperature. It is best to keep them in a room in which the temperature does not fall below 40 at night. It is useless to try to force the spotted calla to bloom in the winter time. The Little Gem is a charming dwarf calla. dwarf calla.

The scarlet Mexican lily is still something of a novelty, but it is certain to be widely cultivated as its merits become known. It can be grown in water exactly as the Chinese sacred lily is grown. It has very large and velvety scarlet flowers and is far more striking than the Chinese lily.

lily is grown. It has very large and velvety scarlet flowers and is far more striking than the Chinese lily.

The fall of the year is the time for planting bulbs in the garden, and most of them should be tucked away in their winter beds by the first of November.

Hyacinths should be planted at least eight inches from the top of the soil. Lilies also require deep planting, and it is best to give them a southern exposure if possible. Tulips do not require such deep planting but they should be placed at least five or six inches under the soil. There is no grander or more beautiful lily for the garden than Lilium auratum. It is a flower that amateurs stand somewhat in awe of, having the impression that only the professional gardener or florist can succeed with it, but this is a mistake. The best bulbs are a little expensive, but once properly planted you may have them for years. Plant the bulb at least ten inches deep, putting under it perhaps a quart of charcoal or broken crockery for drainage. Give the ground a layer of straw with a board on top of it for protection by the first of December.

CONSOMME SOUP.

Three pounds beef,

Three pounds beef, poorer part of round; one pound marrow bone; three knuckles veal; one quart chicken stock; one-third cup each of carrot, turnip and celery, cut in dice; one-third cup sliced onion; two tablespoons butter, one tablespoon salt, one teaspoon perpercorns, four cloves, three sprigs thyme, one sprig marjoram, two sprigs parsley, one-half bay leaf.

Cut the beef into small cubes and brown one-half in some of the marrow from the marrow-

Cut the beef into small cubes and brown one-half in some of the marrow from the marrow-bones; put the remaining half in a kettle of cold water, add the veal cut in pieces, the browned meat and the bones. Let stand one-half hour. Heat slowly to the boiling point and let simmer three hours, removing scum as it forms on top of kettle. Add one quart of liquor in which a fowl was cooked and simmer two hours. Cook carrot, turnip, onion and celery in butter five minutes; add to soup with remaining seasonings. Cook an hour and a half, strain, cool, remove fat and clear with white of egg.

FISH A LA CREME.

Two cups cold flaked fish, one cup white sauce, bit of bay leaf, sprig of parsley, one-half slice onion, salt and pepper, one-half cup cracker crumbs.

Scald the milk, for the making of the white sauce, with bay leaf, parsley and onion. Cover the bottom of a small buttered platter with one-half of the fish, sprinkle with salt and pepper and pour over one half of the sauce. Repeat. Cover with crumbs and bake in a hot oven until the crumbs are brown. May be baked in scallop shells and served individually. White sauce is made in the following proportions: Two tablespoons butter, one and one-half tablespoons flour, one cup scalded milk, one-fourth teaspoon salt and a few grains of pepper. If a thick sauce is required, as for croquettes, use twice the amount of flour, or a little corn-starch.

FISH CROQUETTES.

To two cups cold flaked halibut or salmon add one cup thick white sauce; season with salt and pepper and spread on a plate to cool. Shape, roll in crumbs, egg and crumbs again and fry in a basket in deep fat. Drain on brown paper and garnish with lemon and parsley.

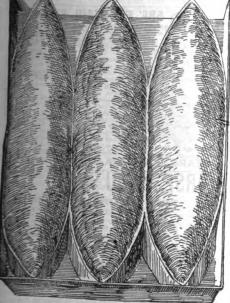

SCALLOPED COD.

Line a buttered baking dish with cold flaked cod, sprinkle with salt and pepper, cover with a layer of oysters (first dipped in melted butter, seasoned with onion juice, lemon juice and a few grains of cayenne and then in cracker crumbs.) Add two tablespoons oyster liquor; repeat and cover with buttered cracker crumbs. Bake twenty minutes in a hot oven. Serve with egg or Hollandaise sauce.

We are illustrating this month some new tine.

We are illustrating this month some new tins for baking bread in the shape of a French loaf.

Of course we all know that the real French bread is baked in long rolls, in the oven,—but in the ordinary range and by the ordinary home cook it is impossible to arrive at the same results as in the case of the baker or caterer.

FRENCH LOAF TIN.

Therefore these tins are made with a view to having the same shaped loaf as the French roll, only it is much shorter; but it has the large amount of crust, which is what we are after.

FRENCH LOAVES.

FRENCH LOAVES.

Scald two cups milk, add one and one-half teaspoons salt and one tablespoon sugar. When lukewarm add one yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup lukewarm water and flour enough to knead. Toss on a floured board and knead thoroughly. Cover and let rise; shape; again let rise and bake in a hot oven forty minutes.

HEALTH FOOD BREAD.

Mix one-half cup brown sugar and one and one-half teaspoons salt; add enough hot water to dissolve them and then add two and one-half cups Wheatena mush. When lukewarm add one-fourth yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup warm water and enough flour to knead having the mixture quite stiff. Cover and let rise, shape in loaves, let rise again and bake in a hot oven from fifty minutes to one hour.

BUTTER CAKES.

BUTTER CAKES.

BUTTER CAKES.

Mix two cups of flour, one-half teaspoon each of salt and soda, and sift twice. Moisten to a dough with buttermilk. Cover and let stand over night or four or five hours will answer. Toss on a floured board, roll out and shape with a biscuit cutter; cook slowly on a griddle until slightly browned, then turn and cook on the other side. Be sure they are thoroughly cooked before taking from the griddle. Split and butter.

Our other illustration is of rolls made as nearly as possible like a four-leaved clover. For the mixture scald two cups milk, add three tablespoons butter, two tablespoons sugar and one teaspoon salt. When lukewarm add one yeast cake dissolved in one-fourth cup warm water and three cups flour. Beat thoroughly, cover and let rise. Cut down and add enough flour to knead. Again let rise, toss on a floured board, knead slightly and shape; let rise in pans and bake in a hot oven fifteen to twenty minutes.

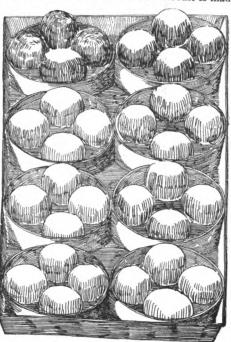

Place buttered muffin rings in a flat buttered pan. Make small biscuit of the dough by rolling in the hands like a marble. Place four of the little balls in each ring, placing no butter between. When baked they will run together in the middle sufficiently to hold them together, and the outer edges will be curved like the leaves.

The mixture is also used for Parker House rolls, salad rolls, ovster rolls and for heriday.

from the above mixture by taking a piece of it, rolling it out quite thin and spreading with melted butter. Then roll it up, like a jelly roll, and cut slices off the end. Place in a buttered pan and bake. They are delicious.

More Artistic Patterns for the Money than were ever Dreamed of.

It has been our special pleasure to select designs for this collection for our artistic friends. Illustration A shows a floral and ribbon design which can be used for almost anything the dainty worker has use for. The flowers are best executed in Kensington stitch, the ribbon may be either simple outline, outline filled in with feather, herring-bone or cat stitch, or, what is still more effective, the long and short stitch. Illustration B is a dainty little design for monograms or what-nots. Note the sizes of the designs named below and the number of sheets of patterns in this outfit. 1 Floral Wreath for Monogram or Handkerchief

CONDUCTED BY DIGITUS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living paimists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMPORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank

for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carfully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a ply-ar cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-breased palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression an large at are must be taken in removing the hand, not to break he plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putly is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

YBIL" sends two excellent smoked paper impressions of her hands giving the markings quite plainly but indicating a very peculiar nature. She is extremely romantic and inclined to be sentimental but is also given to melancholy. She needs to cultivate cheerfulness and the habit of looking at things in as pleasant a light as possible. Her life line indicates a weak state of the health or at least a poor constitution up to the age of forty-five, after which she will be better. In early life she was very much confined and held back by circumstances. Probably her family did something to impede her progress in some ways and she has never entirely recovered from the effects of this repression. She is too much inclined to look upon the dark side and suffers both mentally and physically from her environments. A decided change will come into her life at about the age of thirty-five or forty. She will marry probably at an early age, but will gradually grow away from her husband and will outlive him. There are indications that she will marry a second time not far from thirty-five, and the latter will be the happier marriage of the two. She is of a shy, sensitive nature but very affectionate when she once becomes interested. She will travel a great deal and have many pleasant experiences from so doing. She will live to be quite old and all the latter part of her life will have better prospects generally. There are prospects generally. There are some signs of trouble but these come more from her own over-sensitive nature than from any-thing else. On the whole hers is a hand that in-dicates good fortune although of a varying nature, and while she will have some pecul-iar experiences she will manage she will manage to turn them to a good account.

"SYBIL."

"I. A." has also a peculiar hand. One indicating a very sensitive and nervous temperament although she is of a bright disposition, happy and gay. Her early life has been very much broken up by opposition from others and she has never been al-Internation from others and she has never been allowed to have her own way in any matters. This will continue until she is about twenty after which she will manage her own affairs. She will marry young, perhaps at twenty, and will marry two or three times during her life. She is always admired by the opposite sex and has many friends among them, some of whom will be quite distracted on her account. She seems, however, to be amply able to take care seems, however, to be amply able to take care of herself and will select the right ones for her matrimonial ventures. She has a large and well defined star on the Mount of Apollo which betokens celebrity and I think some degree of wealth although the hollowness of this hand wealth although the hollowness of this hand in the center prevents my following the line of Apollo as I would like to. She also has another line which seldom appears unbroken, and that is the girdle of Venus. This gives the subject decided talent, especially for poetry or art, and it gives a tendency towards spiritualism as well. "L. A." would make a good actress as she has many gifts in that direction. She needs to cultivate self poise and self control. If she decides to cultivate a public career she will meet with some obstacles at first and needs to strengthen her powers of perseverance, after which she will surely succeed. She is needs to strengthen her powers of perseverance, after which she will surely succeed. She is sure to be famous in the end and I think will become wealthy also. Her hand at first glance is almost a discouraging one but the more one studies it the more it promises for the future. Some one asks where is located the plain of Mars? It is all that space on the palm between the life, the line of head and the Mounts of Mars and the moon. The Mounts are situated first, between the mount of Mercury, and the first, between the mount of Mercury, and the mount of the moon, and second, that space under the mount of Jupiter just above the base of the thumb. The plain of Mars is also called the triangle and is composed of the upper angle—i. e., that formed by the junction of the line of life and of head; the inner angle—i. e., that formed by the junction of the line of head with the line of health or the line of fate, at the mount of Mars; and the lower angle, which is formed by the approximation or junction of the line of life and the line of health (when the latter is present.)

The quadrangle is the rectangular space comprised between the lines of the head and of heart, and is generally bounded on the one side by the line of fate and on the other by the line

The rascette or restreinte is the joint on the wrist at which it joins the hand, which is generally occupied by one or more lines, which are more or less ap-parent, the upper one of which is known as the rascette and the others as the re-streintism the whole forming what are called the Bracelets of Life.

The lines gen-rally found in erally found in the hands are as follows: the line of life, which encircles the ball of the thumb or Mount of Venus.

The line of head, which, starting from the beginning of the line of life (to which it is usually joined), be-tween the thumb and first finger, runs straight across the hand.

The line of heart, which, starting from the Mounts of Jupiter or of Saturn, runs across the hand immediately below the Mounts of Saturn, Apollo, and Mercury, ending at the percus

The line of fate or fortune, which starting either from the line of life, from the rascette, or from the Mount of the Moon, runs up more or less directly to the middle finger (the finger of Sature) or less directly to the middle finger (the finger of Saturn.)

The line of health or liver, which, starting near the wrist, at the base of the line of life, rises diagonally across the hand to meet the line of head, close to the Mount of Mars, or at top of the Mount of the Moon.

The line of art and brilliancy, which, rising from the triangle or its vicinity rises to the finger of Apollo (the third), cutting across the mount at its base.

To these are added three lesser lines sometimes found in a hand, which are: The line of Mars, which lies close inside the line of life, which it follows as a sister line.

The ring or girdle of Venus, which encloses the Mounts of Saturn and of Apollo.

The Via Lasciva, or milky way, which, rising from the wrist, traverses the Mount of the Moon.

is the order of the day. The Empire Mustache is the latest fad out. You show your friend the fine growth of nice bigs hair on your lip and say, "How so you like the looks of it?" then while she or he is intently examining it you quietly inflate the thing by a simple, easy breath and—Grent Scott!! Expansion—why you can't keep a straight face when you see the startled look come into your friend's face, for this funny mustache just expands and stretches out way across your face and nearly a foot beyond, then back it comes into position and away it goes again. Thus back and forth it plays to the mystification of the observer and delight of the wearer. The device that works it is so easy and simple that you wonder why it was not invented before. They are the greatest marvel now on the market.

FREE. If you write today sending 10 cents for a three monthly, we will send you a mustache free, postpaid, 3 for 25c, or send 67 cents for one dozen if you want to sell them at a profit. Address

Free Trial Package of This New Discovery Mailed to Every Man Sending Name and Address---Quickly Restores Strength and Vigor.

Free trial packages of a most remarkable remedy are being mailed to all who will write the State Medical Institute. They cured so many men who had battled for years against the mental and physical suffering of lost manhood that the Institute has decided to distribute free trial packages to all who write. It is a home treatment and all men who suffer with any form of sexual weakness resulting from youthful folly, premature loss of strength and memory, weak back, varicocele, or emaciation of parts can now cure themselves at home.

The remedy has a peculiarly grateful effect of warmth and seems to act direct to the desired location giving strength and development just where it is needed. It cures all the ills and troubles that come from years of misuse of the natural functions and has been an absolute success in all cases. A request to the State Medical Institute, 102 Elektron Building, Ft. Wayne, Ind., stating that you desire one of their free trial packages will be complied with promptly. The Institute is desirous of reaching that great class of men who are unable to leave home to be treated and the free sample will enable them to see how easy it is to be cured of sexual weakness when the proper remedies are employed. The Institute makes no restrictions. Any man who writes will be sent a free sample, carefully sealed in a plain package so that its recipient need have no fear of embarrassment or publicity. Readers are requested to write without delay.

Address NATIONAL FARMER. Augusta, Maine

All hail, dear cousins mine, the glad New Year, the beginning of the twentieth century. What it will bring forth none of us will like to know, but it is enough to know that we can do something to make it better if we will, and so let us strive to do, so long as we are with it. Now let us see what we are to talk about.

Now let us see what we are to talk about.

The first to come is Rosebud, Norfolk, Va., who wants to know whether it is her place or the young man's to ask her parents for her. It is the young man's place, though usually the daughter gives her mother or her father a hint that something of the kind may be expected. As Rosebud is only sixteen I would suggest that her parents refuse their consent for four years at least.

Sweet Lullaby, Chicago, Ills.—No. (2) It is not customary to ask your escort at a dance if you can dance with other men. You fill your card as you please, though if he asks you especially not to dance with a certain man, you should regard his wishes.

Rose, Fall City, Cal.—Silver is originally an English word. Still a person of that name might not be English. You will have to take his word for it.

Trix, Sioux Falls, Iowa.—There is no way to change the color of your eyes. You can make your hair grow faster by keeping the scalp clean, brushing with a soft brush, not too much combing. Clean the scalp with yolk of an egg, rubbing it in and rinse with hot water. Clip the hair in the first quarter of each new moon. Your other questions are too silly.

Sweet Sixteen, Kalamazoo, Mich.—Use your own social sense in writing invitations to a birthday party. (2) Address a man as "Mr." unless you know him well enough to call him by his first Eva, Chadbourne, Mo.—Confer with your brother and invite such persons to his birthday party as are acceptable to both of you. (2) Yes, a brother should know of his sister's love affairs, because if he is a good brother he can give her good advice.

he is a good brother he can give her good advice.

Irene, Milton, W. Va.—Yes. (2) Yes. (3) Neither.

He looks after it himself. (4) Men smoke in the presence of women, by permission, either in the house or on a veranda. But not on the street.

Blonde, Hagerman, Ohio.—It is the man's place to write first. (2) No. (3) The man should help the lady out of the carriage. (4) Engaged girls should not "keep company" with other men. (5)
Yes. (6) Ask your mother.

Ella, Lexington, Ky.—Certainly the man who merely calls could not ask you to stay away from the opera on his account. Go, of course. (2) The man precedes the lady on entering any public place.

Two Cousins, Delta, Ohio.—Customs vary, but 10.30 P. M. is time for a young man to go. (2) Either may ask, or neither. It is one of the things you just do. (3) Kissing games are vulgar. (4) Circumstances only can determine when it is correct to introduce the man first. An old man or one of distinction, however, takes precedence. (5) Introduce your mother simply as your mother, unless she is married again and has not your name, or you are married, and her name is not known to the person introduced.

A. A. Taylorsville. Ala.—A very good reply to

A. A., Taylorsville, Ala.—A very good reply to "Thank You," is "Not at all," with a little bow; same for "much obliged." (2) It is nice to greet people who come into your office with a word of welcome, whether you know them or not.

V. F. C., Davenport, Iowa.—Evidently the young man is "miffed" about something, and it will be just as well to let him come to his senses himself. Return his books and pictures with very brief thanks.

Vina, St. Louis, Mo.—The young man is treating on exactly right, and you would get what you de-erve if you never saw him again.

Cora, Hampton, Minn.—Cora dear, suppose you ask me two questions at a time instead of two long pages full. Which reminds me to say that the cousins mustrit expect this column to answer all the questions of a whole lifetime at once. Ask a few questions only if you want them all answered. Autumn Flower, Texas.—Yes, tell him that you love him if you do, but not otherwise. What did you expect to tell him?

Rose, Rochester, Mich.—Certainly a man may go with one girl and write to others. (2) A lady's invitations do not usually include the men she knows, nor vice versa. (3) How is the gentleman to go with the lady if he does not ask her? Catch her in a net and take her anyhow?

Nancy Hanks, Frost, Col.—Clay was born in Virginia, Jackson in North Carolina, Polk in North Carolina, Harrison in Virginia, Taylor in Virginia, Grant in Ohio, Poe in Maryland (Baltimore).

Grant in Ohio, Poe in Maryland (Baltimore).

Beauty, Erie, Kans.—It may not be exactly proper for girls to linger after church to give the young fellows a chance to take them home, but custom and sentiment seem to sanction it. (2) Girl scholars should not have mild flirtations, or other kind, with their teachers. (3) Yes, the man should take both girls home; that is a girl who goes to church with another girl should not desert her, unless it is so agreed. (5) Dou't write love letters; they may embarrass you sometime.

A. D., Hendersonville, N. C.—There is no way of "shining" in conversation; but by careful and wide reading you can acquire such knowledge that you cannot be ignored in any company. Keep posted on all current matters as well, and when you have something to tell, people will listen. (2) Ignore the young man who prefers questionable subjects and "lets on" as if he were perfectly innocent. A gentleman will not do that.

Brown Eyes, Rockdale, Ky.—Being of the feminine gender you know as well as I do how to decline an invitation from a man without hurting his feelings. Every woman has her own way of doing that and there isn't any rule. (2) A lady may ask a gentleman to call.

Rose, Davenport, Iowa.—I know no such firm.

(2) Word your congratulations to a married couple to suit yourself. (3) Ask your home music dealer.

(4) Contracts made on Sunday are void, but marriages seem to stand. (5) Say what you please in response to an introduction. (6) Agate is the birthstone for June, and opals are not unluckier than other stones. (7) Don't be friendly with traveling men unless you know thoroughly who they are.

Lottie, Crescent, Wash.—Thirty years old is just the right age for a man. Don't kiss him till you are engaged. (2) Danes with the man of two ask-ing at once, who you think asked first. (2) Lemon juice is said to be good to remedy dandruff. Keep the juice from the hair as much as possible. For the face and hands a lotion of a wineglassful of lemon juice, a pint of rain water and five drops of essence of rose. Apply two or three times a week. Ask your druggist for a good tooth powder. There are many of them.

There, dears, all of you are answered that ought to be, and by, by, till our next meeting.

GALENA, ILLINOIS, Oct. 15th, 1900.

TO THE GIANT CO., AUGUSTA, MAINE.
GENTLEMEN: Do you realize I have been selling your remedies for the past nine years? After acting thus as your agent for this long period it is not flattery when I say to you that no business house exists that can surpass your own in honesty and fair dealings—even more, generosity to its patrons. Not one jar or the slightest cause for complaint is surely evidence beyond question in my nine years' dealings with you. May you live long to enjoy the good you are doing is the wish of Yours truly,
FANNIE AUBUCHON.

A TEN YEARS' TEST.

THE GIANT CO. MUNCIE, INDIANA, Oct. 10th, 1900.
GENTLEMEN: After ten years of successful work for you I can truthfully say that you have more than done as you agreed during my long period of selling your famous Oxien Remedies. There has nothing taken away the Joy that came to me from getting my first box of Oxien. As for Premiums I have received so many and such nice ones, too, that I cannot possibly enumerate them. They were all fine and perfectly satisfactory. I consider your firm one of the best in existence and although I have had many flattering offers to work for other concerns, I have always been true to The Giant Oxie Co., for they have been housest and faithful in carrying out their promises to me. Wishing you continued prosperity, I remain, Yours truly, EMMA E. BRANSON.

EING husband to a Queen is a serious matter, not lightly to be entered upon, and not so common as one would think at first. Of course there is a reasonably large number of royal women who have husbands who there is a reasonably large in umber of royal women who have husbands who have husbands who are kings, but that is a very d if fere in thing from being the husband of a woman who is a queen in her own right. The recent betrothal of the girl Queen of Holland, Wilhelmina, recalls how few such marriagining queen has taken a husband. The last to do so was Isabella of Spain, who on the tenth of October, 1846, married her cousin, Don Francisco d'Assissi. The queen was only sixteen years old at the time. Don Francisco received the title of King Consort. The marriage was never a happy one; and innumerable scandals, intrigues and jealousies followed it.

Only one reigning European queen of modern times has had two husbands. This was Maria II. of Portugal. Her first husband was Prince Augustus, of Leuchtenburg, to whom she was married December 1st, 1834, and who died less than four months afterwards. A year later the queen married Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg, a relative of Queen Victoria's husband. He was given the title of King Consort. He was always popular in Portugal, where he survived his royal wife by several years. After her death he married the famous German American dancer, Fannie Ellsler, who was afterwards made Countess of Edla. Strange indeed are the histories of those who live within the rays of "the light that beats upon a throne."

Of course the marriage of Queen Victoria occurs to every one, at once, as the most notable example of a semi-royal union in the history of modern times. Her husband was Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, to whom she was married February 10th, 1840. He never was to take the title of King Consort, and had to content himself with being known as Prince Consort. There have occasionally been rumors that Queen Victoria was a jealous wife, but these do not seem to be very well authenticated, and it is much more probable that this was an exceptionally happy royal marriage. Certainly the widowed queen's devotion to her husband's memory, and her success as a mother in bringing up her family ing up her family of children since his death, have been conspicuous.

Some other English queens have had interesting histories in the way of husbands. Princess Mary of York married William of Orange. Later, when she became queen, he was crowned with her as king. This double coronation necessitated the making of a second coronation chair, so that the two sovereigns could receive the royal honors together. The original English coronation chair is over six hundred years old, and every English sovereign who has ascended the throne during all that time has sat in this chair which is kept in Westminster Abbey, where Queen Victoria sat in it for a second time at the great celebration which commemorated her fittieth anniversary. The second chair, made for William of Orange, stands beside st. People who look at the two chairs closely see that the seat of the new one is about four inches the higher. Thereby is revealed a queer bit of royal pride. Queen Mary was a large woman, nearly six feet tall. Her husband was a rather small man, and not her equal in height. That he might not look insignificant beside her at the coronation ceremony his chair was made enough higher than hers so that his head was brought up to the level where hers was.

Atter King William died—his wife having was.

After King William died—his wife having died some years before he did—the Princess Anne became queen. She is usually known in history as "Good Queen Anne." This descriptive epithet may have been gained because she did not do anything of very much account, either good or bad. One printed opinion of her and her husband says: "Queen Anne came to the throne bringing with her as husband Prince George of Denmark, a fat-headed person of no importance. He never received any title as husband of the queen, not even that of Prince Consort. Without injustice it may be said of this royal pair,

"They both are well mated for life, For she's got a fool for a husband, And he's got a fool for a wife."

That Mary, Queen of England, who is generally known in history as "Bloody Mary," is one of the few who married a distinctly royal

WHILE there are some people who have a vague idea that coins issued 100 or 1000 years ago are worth fabulous sums, yet very few know that coins issued only a few years ago are at a large premium. For instance, the silver dollars of 1856 and many of the earlier ones. The first Columbian half-dollar, issued 1892, sold for $1,000. All the half-dollars form 1879 to 1890 are at a premium, also Isabella quarters of 1896, the old issue of the quarters and half-dollars of 1855, twenty-cent pieces 1876 to 1878; five and three-cent pieces of 1877; last issue of the two-cent copper and three-cent silver pieces; first issue of the nickel cents, all gold dollars and three-dollar gold pieces; all Territorial and California coins from 1849 to 1880, and thousands of earlier American and Foreign coins, Canadam especially. husband, and the marriage was most unhappy. Her husband was Philip II., King of Spain, Naples and Sicily. The jealousies which followed this marriage were endless and bitter, and they were not only personal but national. The queen was furiously jealous—and apparently with reason—of her royal husband's fondness for other women. The English people were intensely opposed to any possibility of having him become their ruler, and the people of Spain were no less unfriendly towards their sovereign's English wife. Few queens have crowded more sorrow into so short a period as this one did into her short reign.

That other unhappy royal Mary—Mary, Queen of Scots—was one of the most married of royal women. When she was so young that she was known as "the little Queen of Scotland," she was married to the Dauphin of France, who was afterwards for a few months king of that country. After he had died and she had been a widow for five years she married her cousin, Henry Stuart, whose title was that of Lord Darnley. He died a most tragic death, and the queen afterwards married another Scotch noble, James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell. They had been married only a month when her subjects revolted, made her a prisoner, and compelled her to abdicate the throne. She was a prisoner for many years after that, and was finally beheaded. In spite of all her troubles and disgraces, her son became the first king of united England and Scotland, and the founder of a long line of sovereigns.

It is to be hoped that Queen Wilhelmina's marriage will be a happier one than the most of these which have been recalled. It seems to be as true a "love match" as any in the most plebeian circles. Prince Henry of Mecklenburg-Schwerin comes of what is the only reigning family in western Europe which is of Slavonic origin. It is one of the oldest, if not the very oldest royal house in Germany. Oddly enough meither he nor the queen are related to Queen Victoria, although there are few of the royal personages in Europe now who are not.

The Queen of Holland saw her future husband for the first time less than a year before they become engaged. She met him in Berlin. It was a "love at first sight" affair. There had been arranged by some of the Queen's friends and would-be advisers, a grand dinner to which there were invited a number of eligible young semi-royal men from whom it was hoped that she might select a husband. After the queen met Prince Henry she would have no more of the scheme. She refused to go to the dinner, pleaded that she had a cold, and stayed at home. The royal candidates got no further with their suits. The queen's mother, seeing how the wind was blowing, cut the visit in Berlin short and took her royal daughter off home to Holland, and like a prudent mother began to make inquiries about Prince Henry. As all these inquiries resulted favorably, the Queen mother allowed arrangements to be made by which a better acquaintance was possible. She planned to take her daughter to spend a month or so in the Schwartzburg, in a castle there, within the domains of the Prince, and the Dowager Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, the Duke's mother, was invited to be her guest.

The plan worked beautifully. The Prince got a furlough from the army and came to see his mother. Then he prolonged his stay and devoted his time to acting as guide for the two Queens to many of the picturesque and beautiful places in the Principality. It is reported that when the party broke up the young Queen said to him: "What a happy tour! I never spent such a happy time in my life, and I feel I owe so much to you." Correspondence and the natural result followed, and eventually the Queen summoned her prime minister to the Palace of Loo, to tell him that she had selected a husband for herself. Everybody is pleased, and wishes them all possible happiness.

A RELIABLE ADVERTISING HOUSE.

It is always a pleasure to be able to say a pleasant rord in passing for a reliable advertiser. In our advertising columns is often to be found the announcements of R. E. Chalmers & Co., Chicago, Ilis., who sell watches etc. Their offers are always profitable; and, in a long course of business with them, we have never had complaint of them from their patrons who have seen their ads, in Comfort. This is a fine record for any business house.

WE GIVE THIS WATCH FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 25 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you a nice chain. Address

HE idea of women in liveries was at first laughed at, but something like a year ago a number of titled Englishwomen declared that they would no longer employ male butlers and other indoor servants of the male persuasion, but would substitute liveried women in their places, which they have done, with the best possible results. Now the New York housekeepers are following out this idea, and the liveried woman servant is becoming a recognized institute.

out this idea, and the liveried woman servant is becoming a recognized institution. In the New York homes where women in these special costumes serve the butler wears a black coat and skirt made of fine French cloth, which comes within a couple of inches of the floor and has a strap of black silk running from belt to the bottom, on either hip. The coat is an Eton, cut with a point behind and turning back in front with revers faced with the silk. A white shirt is worn, which is stiff and in every respect like a man butler's shirt and the waistcoat is a low cut one of linen. A white collar, white tie and white cuffs complete this smart costume. No cap is worn with this dress. This costume is worn simply when serving. During the day a colored livery of dark blue or brown with a band of red or yellow material let in about a foot above the hem, a waistcoat buttoning to the chin of striped red and white or yellow and white, and over this an Eton to match the skirt, ornamented with gilt buttons, is worn. This is for the butleress. The footwoman wears quite as smart a costume and usually it is more brilliant. These women are addressed by their surnames, as are men butlers, and women in high life who employ a large number of servants and have tried the females in the place of the males, say the result is so satisfactory that they will have men only in their stables.

LOW AS $2 CENTS, but the greatest camera value ever off HOW WE MAKE THE PRICE $3.75

The Delmar Folding Camera and Outfit is made for usunder contract by one of the largest manufacturers in this country, one of the largest contract sever taken by a manufacturer, the cost to us to be figured on the basis of the actual cost of material and labor, with a very small percentage allowed for manufacturing profit. Our contract called for a strictly reliable, high grade folding camera, a camera to embody all the essential features of high grade folding cameras that have retailed everywhere at $15.00 to $25.00. Knowing that the cost of material and labor, even on high priced folding cameras, represented but a small part of the average selling price of these goods, we conceived the idea of having a camera built for our customers on these lines and selling it at at price based on factory cost, and as a result, you have in the DELMAR CAMERA, can be could produce a high grade folding camera, we believed if we could produce a high grade folding camera, EMBODYING THE NEW 1901 FEATURES, have it built by a maker of high grade cameras and at a cost to make that which the largest of such cameras we would greatly increase the distribution of the DELMAR CAMERA, following our plain simple instructions for taking and developing pictures, will become interested in the work, will become customers for picture making supplies, dry plates, card mounts, developing material, etc. We believe it would be profitable to our photographic department as a supply trade maker, to sell the Delmar Camera at actual cost to make, in fact, our special $8.75 price is made almost without regard to profit to the manufacturer or to ourselves. It is made as an inducement to get our customers interested in photography and picture making and thus increase the sales of photographic supplies. HE law as to findings says that one who is so fortunate as to find what belongs to another must always act honestly, and if, at the time of the find-ing he has the means of knowing, or believes he can find out who the owner is, and makes no effort to discover him but intentionally keeps or disposes of the property, the law regards him as no better than a thief. On the other hand, if the owner does not appear, the finder acquires, by common law, an absolute title to the thing found.

In olden times, when things were generally hidden in the earth, the king of the country in which treasure was found was held to be the owner, in case of the finding of valuables. Lost articles found upon the surface of the earth, or in the sea, are considered to be the property of the one who finds them, if the real owner is not to be found. The purchaser of an old secretary sometimes finds a secret drawer in which are money or valuables long forgotten, and these valuables rightly belong to him, if it so happens that he has bought the article of furniture in a second hand shop or auction room, for they are not considered to belong to the man of whom he bought the article, as he did not find them; according to the law in such cases, the finder has absolute right to articles or money thus found. articles or money thus found.

HOUSE specially designed for the production of optical illusions has just been patented in this country by an English inventor named Kotin. It is built upside down, to begin with, resting begin with, resting upon its chimneys. When one enters it, he finds himself in the midst of such a remarkable arrangement ven the most well-bal-of eye deceptions that even the most well-bal-anced person mentally is sure to find himself thoroughly at odds with his own understanding.

Much of the mischief depends upon curious arrangements of mirrors. One floor, for example, is of glass, beneath which are two mirrors.

ample, is of glass, beneath which are two mirrors so placed as to reflect the sky and cause the visitor to imagine that the sky is beneath him and that he is walking on his head. Entering from below—i.e., in the upper part of the inverted building—he actually ascends a series of staircases, but while doing so he seems all the time to be descending. Furthermore, some of the rooms are so fixed that other people in them appear to be sitting on the ceiling. The corridors or passages of this remarkable house are six-sided and walled with mirrors, affording some very curious optical effects, and the floor of one room is placed on springs in such a way as to sway and totter when one enters it, thus conveying to the visitor a sense of insecurity that might perhaps be painful to the timid. Nothing quite so odd as this building of illusions has thus far been seen, indeed, and it is to be expected that before long persons who enjoy that sort of thing will have an opportunity to wander through such houses, for a small advision for at the summer seen. opportunity to wander through such houses, for a small admission fee, at the summer re-

SUCCESS.

Customers that make one purchase only, are not the ones that enable the merchant to build up a successful business. He must satisfy his customers by his first and every succeeding sale, that he is selling honest goods at honest prices to encourage them to patronize him continually, for only by repeated sales to regular customers can he expect to succeed.

The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, O., (see advertisement page 23,) has conducted a remarkably successful business since 1885, and is now the largest and wealthiest firm in the United States dealing exclusively in imported articles for special diseases, and the financial and mercantile character of this firm has never been questioned.

THE BOUNDING BILLOW.

THE BATTLE OF MANILA BAY.

Way down in the very stern of Dewey's flagship, the Olympia, is located the publication office of what is perhaps the most curious newspaper on earth. It is called "The Bounding Billow" and in times of peace it appears with more or less regularity. Engines of war share its quarters, however, for under the cases of type runs a Whitehead torpedo tube, while wire nets of steel above the printers' heads on each side contain spare torpedos.

The editor and printers of "The Bounding Billow" serve in this capacity only in times of peace. When fighting is to be done the type-cases are safely packed away, and the printers take up their stations in the powder magazine. The uncertainty about the times when they may be called upon to fight naturally interferes somewhat with the regular publication of their paper.

The first numbers were printed when the may be called upon to light hatdrally intertees somewhat with the regular publication of their paper.

The first numbers were printed when the Olmypia was off the Japanese coast. During the battle of Manila the office of "The Bounding Billow" was snugly stowed away, but as soon as the battle was over the cases of type were set up and the printers busied themselves in publishing an account of the fight. It is not too much to say that this was probably the first time in history that the account of a battle has been printed on board the victorious flag-ship and only a few hours after the victory. But besides publishing the paper, the "Billow" office prints all the official orders, reports and documents for the admiral while the paper itself is the official organ of the Asiatic squadron. Published for the benefit of the "jackies" copies of the paper are eagerly sought, and hundreds of copies are sent home by them for souvenirs. While the squadron lay at Manila "The Bounding Billow" received a quantity of elaborate illustrated covers as a present from a large Chicago firm, and was therefore enabled to make a specially fine appearance for one number. pearance for one number.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

N January 20th, this year, the moon overtakes the Sun at nearly a half past nine o'clock in the sun at nearly and Moon will occur in the 10th house inside the first five degrees of the sign Capricorn; Saturn will be nearly together in tusp; Mercury near the Sun will be in the 11th house; Herschel will be in the 9th house; Mars will be just setting in the west and Neptune will be in the 4th house.

The great benefic, Jupiter, is the ruler of the scheme and he is highly elevated near the south meridian. This figure is another of the happy ones in promise for the prosperity and welfare of the Nation during the current weeks. The figure is a very powerful one for good. There are indications of some very unusual excitement in Congress; there will be some legislation advocated affecting the agricultural interests of the country and much discussion as to the policy of the Nation with reference to colonial matters and mining interests. Mars falling into the 6th house points to some kind of epidemic eruptive disease. There will be a large increase of mortality among the soldiers in the extreme West, probably from bowel and liver disorders. Let all have unusual care that diseases of the lungs are promptly treated, as indications are that such diseases will be peculiarly aggravated and unusually fatal, especially to persons born about the 4th of March, 2nd of June and September and 1st of December of past years.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR FEBRUARY, 1901.

FEBRUARY 1-Friday. Do not expect much profit advantage from the elegant avocations or from busior advantage from the elegant avocations or from business dealings in artistic or decorative wares; social matters are adversely affected and no matrimonial contract abould be made; the latter part of the day calls for patience and suggests a bridle for the tongue and passions. 2-Saturday. This day is not specially conducive to uccess in any particular direction; avoid associations with very aged or eccentric individuals.

3-Sunday. A favorable Sabbath day, though strange

4—Monday. After the morning this is especially for-tunate; buy goods for trade; have money dealingo; so-lict favor from banks and wealthy persons; urge collec-tions and make agreements pertaining to loans.

6—Tuesday. With due regard to caution against haste and preceptitancy in all matters in the morning hours, let all energies be put forth in forwarding the business enterprises of the time, but particularly those that are concerned with matters of building, excavating, mining and agriculture. Give attention also to patents, trade-marks, copyrights and all classes of printing.

6-Wednesday. Begin early and improve every mo-nent in the pursuit of art, music, and in the elegant avo-ations generally; deal in fancy goods and engage in usiness pertaining to decoration, adornment, furnish-ags and dramatic goods or entertainments.

Temperature goods or entertainments.

Temperature Choose not this time for speculation or hazardous business ventures; embarrassment in finances is induced; do not expect much success in collecting funds and do not bind thyself by note or other written promise; do not apply for increase of wages or for money favors.

S-Friday. The early morning hours are baffling and disappointing, but as the forenoon advances give all energies to the pursuit of business, especially such as is conducted with public officers and government employes, railroad men and all incorporate bodies. Correspondence and other literary work is less favored and personal application for favor will be the most successful.

9—Saturday. Give preference to the forenoon for the best efforts in the major undertakings of life; but do not use the afternoon or evening for any engagement towards wedlock nor expect much in the elegant pursuits or dealings in fancy goods, nor choose the time for selecting dress goods or wearing apparel, or for any important engagement of a social, musical, or artistic character; crowd all literary work in the evening.

Sunday. A superior Sabbath day for matters opriate; the mind will be especially active in the ning and religious discourse will be earnest and elo-

11—Monday. Give no offence to thy superior or employer, nor seek advantage from persons in authority; these passing hours hold more than usual annoyance for persons born about the 26th of February, 28th of May, or the 30th of August or November of past years. Matters to such persons will seem to "all go wrong" and there will be quite a degree of mental excitement or worry. In many cases the mental disquietudes will not be warranted by existing facts, but will be rather the result of some degree of nervous disorder. Such persons should be very guarded not to be rushed into the commission of acts which the exercise of a fair degree of moderation would prevent. "Don't jump too quickly."

12—Tuesday. Arise early and engage actively in the 12—Tuesday. Arise early and engage actively in the elegant pursuits and light employments, also deal in fancy goods and articles of adornment; engage with thy tailor, dressmaker and milliner, and do all things requiring the exercise of special taste; the afternoon conduces to rashness, peevishness and excitability, when also the temper will need to be carefully guarded.

13—Wednesday. This day is rather unfavorable for most of the undertakings of life and prompts caution in all our acts, the avoidance of disputes and controversies and as much as possible all danger of accidents and hurts, and let the tongue be kept well under control. These suggestions are peculiarly appropriate for persons born about the 14th of February, 24th of April, 17th of August or 30th of October of past years.

August or 30th of October of past years.

14—Thursday. Push business vigorously all this day; deal with government officials and persons in authority in the forenoon; as the noon is passed bend all energies to the pursuit of all commercial undertakings of magnitude; open new stores, buy merchandise for trade; deal with manufacturers and mechanics and trade in cattle, machinery, chemicals, drugs, firearms, and all manufactured articles; have money dealings of consequence and solicit money accommodations.

15—Friday. Conflicting conditions prevail in the morning which are likely to hinder satisfactory progress in affairs, but after the noon hour more promising influences rule and give successful outcome to efforts; use the afternoon for correspondence and mental labors generally; have dealings with persons in the literary walks of life; execute commercial contracts and travel.

16—Saturday. This day is not specially conducive to success in any particular direction, but is, if anything, somewhat detrimental to advancement of the intellectual and literary pursuits.

17—Sunday. The mind will incline towards the elegant in literature and the imagination will be especially active; the musical portions of religious worship will be particularly successful.

18—Monday. See that temptations to gratify taste or vanity do not induce extravagant expenditures during the forenoon; otherwise press all business efforts to the utmost throughout the day, without making any beginnings in undertakings of consequence.

19—Tuesday. One of the excellent days of the month; be up with the Sun and urge business vigorously throughout the day; buy goods to sell again, deal with banks or persons of wealth or distinction; choose the noon hour for urging affairs of importance concerning houses and lands and for dealing with farmers, miners, plumbers, nurserymen and cattle raisers; use the forenoon for be-

20 - Wednesday. Do not relax thine efforts of yesterday, but be up and doing in every available moment of the day; the forenoon encourages mathematical studies and scientific pursuits generally; engage servants and transact business with lawyers, teachers, and all employed with the pen; execute contracts in the morning, when also mental efforts will result satisfactorily.

21—Thursday. Those who speculate with their money in the forenoon of this day need not expect much profit; look out for the purse and avoid controversy and dispute; avoid thy landlord in the afternoon when thou shouldst avoid all dealings pertaining to houses or lands or their improvements; the day is an unsatisfactory one for most of the affairs of life.

22—Friday. Give preference to the latter half of this day for thine efforts in business, though in the mechanical and chemical pursuits less satisfactory progress will be made than in other directions; persons born about the 22nd of February, 25th of May, 26th of August, or 25th of November, of past years are likely to be now in the midst of contention or disputes or are having annoying experiences in their affairs; they should avoid placing themselves in positions of danger, should be guarded in handling fire, steam, inflammables or explosives; should be patient in their business associations, avoiding rupture in business connections and practicing patience and moderation in all they do.

23—Saturday. One of the best days of the month, in which no effort should be spared for advancement of all business enterprises; buy goods for trade, seek money accommodations and speculate in stocks, if thy nativity Mkewise favor; deal in real estate, mines, agricultural products and implements, mining machinery, chemicals and drugs, and let every honorable undertaking be urged to the utmost.

24—Sunday. Influences are very promising for advancement of all products and implements of the sunday.

24—Sunday. Influences are very promising for advancement of religious interests and church matters, being also conducive in a marked degree to eloquent pulpit utterances and best mental efforts.

pit uterances and best mental efforts.

25—Monday. This day is contentious and excitable and promotes disputes and disorder; exciting evilly disposed minds to acts of deception and treachery. It will be well if fires have been guarded against during these passing days for the time has been peculiarly mischievous in this respect. See that no business disagreement has come from too hasty word or act.

26—Tuesday. Have no dealings with government officials nor be concerned in patent matters; do not travel needlessly; postpone important correspondence; be careful to avoid mistakes in writings or accounts, especially in the late afternoon or evening; the middle hours of the day should be used for painting and musical matters and dealings with the tailor, milliner, dressmaker, embroiderer, and workers in wax and artistic materials.

27—Wednesday. Use every moment of the first two-thirds of this day, giving preference, if any, to all the mechanical and manufacturing enterprises; urge sales of merchandise, travel, trade in cattle and metals, and deal with chemists, physicians, military men, and cutlers; in the afternoon do not purchase goods for trade nor give business credits or loans of money; see that no extravagance is indulged in and be prudent in the use of the purse in all things.

Until further notice the well-known importers, Von Mohl Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, will send free to all who apply enough of their famous specific, "Calthos," for Nervous and Sexual diseases, to last five days. In many instances where the ailment has not advanced to an extreme stage, this is sufficient for a cure. This is no G. V. D. fraud or DEPOSII scheme. Send your name and address to-day and "Calthos" will reach you in a plain, sealed package by return mail.

There is absolutely no publicity in receiving or taking it. Full directions and at reatise accompany it. When you have read these you will fully understand your own case and be able to be your own doctor. The Von Mohl Company makes this generous offer in order that every weak, suffering man may take advantage of it without incurring the slightest expense. This offer is genuine. The Von Mohl Company is known as the richest and largest importing firm of its kind in the world, and its standing in the commercial world is ample proof of its straightforward business methods.

"CALTHOS" is the discovery of Prof. Jules Laborde, the most famous chemist in France. Before the introduction of this wonderful vitalizer, Medical Science agreed that there was no specific for lost manhood and the various forms of sexual weakness. "CALTHOS" changed this opinion, and today the wonderful physical development and endurance of the soldiers in the great standing armies of Germany and France is due to the use of this marvelous remedy. The American rights for "CALTHOS" are controlled solely by the Von Mohl Company, who introduced it into the United States.

"CALTHOS" reaches the seat of disease as no other remedy can do, acting directly on Nerves, Circulatory System and Mucous Membranes. It has cured thousands in this country alone. If you are wasted away by indulgence in youthful errors, excesses in later life, overwork and worry, remember that "CALTHOS" is a guaranteed cure in all stages of sexual weakness before epilepsy, consumption or insanity has set in. "CALTHOS" brings new life and new vigor, puts healthy, glowing blood in the veins and brings back the springy, elastic step, sparkling eye and pleasurable sensations of younger days. It will restore that superb manhood that is the admiration of men and women. Nothing can do more than this; nothing as much.

"CALTHOS" cures SPERMATOR-RHEA. IMPOTENCE, VARICOCELE, SHRUNKEN PARTS, and all evidences of sexual decay. The VON MOHL COMPANY treats all corres pondence as sacred-

SHRUNKEN PARTS, and all evidences of sexual decay. The VON MOHL COMPANY treats all corres pondence as sacredly confidential.

If YOU would have freedom from degrading weakness; if you would know health and happiness that comes from sturdy manhood, accept this offer to-day. THIS IS OUR CATALOGUE

The building represented on the cover of this catalogue is the tallest mercantile building in the world. It is owned and occupied exclusively by us. It contains 25 acres of floor space, and we carry here a stock of merchandise valued at $2,500,000 that is sold only by mail.

We publish a book that a million people have sent for. It contains 1,200 pages and 17,000 pictures. It gives wholesale prices—the lowest ever quoted—on 70,000 articles. Every kind and grade of everything you wear or use is priced in it; and most of the things you eat. It tells you the least that anything can be bought for. It tells you about what your dealer pays. You need this book for a buying guide, and we want you to have it.

Greatest Mail Order House

This book is the catalogue of the greatest mail order house in the world—the originators of the catalogue business. We have been right here in this business for 25 years, and we want our children to continue after we are gone. Our clerks are all instructed to do as they would be done by, and under this golden rule we have built up a business amounting to millions of dollars annually. We have two million customers, employ 2,000 clerks, make 13,000 shipments daily. Our book tells the prices that lead these millions to buy here.

We Are Reliable You want this book because we are reliable. You know that every description in it is exactly correct. The struggle for business today leads to every sort of misrepresentation. Shoddy goods are offered so that startling prices may be quoted. Second-class goods are offered as first-class. Descriptions are cunningly devised to deceive you and at the same time not actually lie. We pledge you our honor that not a word in our catalogue is, even in the slightest degree, either untrue or misleading. You want the prices of an honest house.

Our Prices Are Lowest When you see a bargain price advertised on anything you can be sure that our catalogue gives a lower price, if the article is good enough for us to catalogue at all. Our description may not be so alluring, but it will have the advantage of truth. Nobody believes that any store can buy lower than we, for we are the largest buyers. The purchases of two thousand average stores combined would not equal ours. The fiercest competition in America centers in this store. The lowest prices that makers ever quote are given us. And some articles that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. We can thus sell anything for what your dealer pays, or less. We could not do a business of millions of dollars a year by mail if we did not undersell everybody on everything.

Our Unequalled Guarantee We guarantee that any article purchased from our catalogue will satisfy you. Others warrant an article to be as described, but descriptions are often misleading. We alone guarantee that any article will give satisfaction. If it doesn't, send it back, and we will send you something else, paying transportation both ways for you. Or we will send your money back, with all that you paid for freight or express to get the article to you. We don't want your money if we cannot make you glad you sent it to us. Our main object in selling you anything is to lead you to buy here again and again.

About C. O. D. Shipments

we send goods C. O. D., subject to inspection, if enough is sent with the order to indicate good faith. We do not send out goods promiscuously, without any deposit, because too many accept such offers without any intention of buying. The transportation both ways on refused shipments must be added to the price charged those who pay. Our prices could not be nearly so low if we did that. The best way is to remit with your order, and save return express charges on money, which saving, with the cash discount, often pays freight or express on the goods. We guarantee that every penny you pay us will be returned if you are not satisfied, and our guarantee is backed by millions of dollars that are invested in this business.

Me Answer Letters A hundred typewriters are employed here to answer your letters. Ask any question you want to. We will tell you the cost of delivering anything to your station either by freight, express or mail. If you see anything advertised at a price that seems lower than our price, ask us about it before you buy. We can often offer a similar article for less, and may save you from deception.

Send Only 15 Cents If you want our catalogue, fill out carefully the slip to the left of this, and mail it to us to-day, enclosing 15 cents. This catalogue which we offer you costs us about 70 cents to print, even in million lots. The postage on it costs us 32 cents more. We ask you to send us but 15 cents (less than half the postage alone) just to show that you do not send from mere curiosity.

This book will save any average family at least $100 per year. If you don't find that it will save you at least a hundred times what it costs you, simply write us and we will cheerfully send your 15 cents back. Please send today, before you forget it.

ELL, I'm that goldarned tired. I could bust out acryin'!" The speaker dropped limply into the one rickety chair the place afforded. She was very much out of breath; she was rather stormy as to expression; and, it must be confessed. somewhat grotesquely dressed. She had a bundle in her arms that threatened to spill its contents any moment; she clutched at a big roll of glaring yellow handbills while trying to hold a small white bouquet with her other encumbrances; but dusty, tired, and disheveled, she was wonderfully pretty! And when we say a girl is wonderfully pretty, the practised story reader pricks up his ears for he knows that is where and why most stories begin.

There had been an encouraging shout from a half dozen miners and cowboys outside the dance hall as Nan entered. She fanned vigorously for a moment smiling grimly, then broke out. "I don't care, I got here first. I saw me rival startin' out pickin' her way, an' I say to myself: Nan ye'se been the miner's pride and pet since ye wuz a baby an' on this night, the great annual ball of the Bloody Buccaneersain't that a grand name? there an't a soul in town knows what it means! well, I sez, ye must be fust on the spot; an'-I came lickity plit! Ther ain't never been a gal on the plain could sing or dance or shoot with me; an' now Mexican Joe has got to go meddlin' an' gettin' up this here prize winnin' contest for the best singer an' dancer an' bringin' thet sickly lookin'gal out here to-to try for the prizes; it makes me sick!" Nan gulped down a sob as she crossed over to the primitive sideboard. The familiar whiskey bottle and a glass were picked up almost unconsciously, and Nan proceeded to pour out a generous drink, but paused with it half way to her mouth, and with a curious look, she set it down again, reached over for a larger tumbler which held some water and began to arrange in it her little drooping half dozen flowers with as much care as if they had been the rarest orchids.

"Tain't enough to have Eastern Song Bird for yer rival, but it likes to harrer my feelin's when I think that the best steady I ever had got killed last night, and is layin' dead thar in the next room! An' I ain't got the money to bury him decent. The prize is wuth two hundred dollars. My, what a funeral that would pay for! I must win it--I will win it!"

Carefully carrying the precious bouquet, Nan crossed to the inner room-"Bill, you wuz a good man to me an' I'll sing for ye to-night with all my heart and soul as I never sung for give me courage for Jancin' an' winnin' the ions on the subject. I was daily communicated yer while yer wuz alive." And Nan's bright prize." dark eyes glowed and cheeks crimsoned with the earnestness of her promise. Presently there was a timid knock at the door and it was pushed open, so gently it must have surprised that old door more accustomed to kicks and even shots. A girl entered younger and smaller than Nan, a dainty creature graceful as a fairy; by the roll of music she carried it was quite easy to guess that it was Nan's rival.

"The Great Eastern Song Bird." She looked about her in affright as she exclaimed "Oh, dear, I wonder if this is the place? I'm half scared to death. They say there was a murder here last night and that 'it' has not been taken away yet. What an awful place to hold a ball in! Oh, I will be so glad when Mexican Joe gets here; he don't seem like the rest of these looking men."

There was a slight sound behind her, and the poor Song Bird jumped as if she expected a grizzly bear to leap out of the piano, but it was only Nan, looking crosser than any selfrespecting grizzly ever dare look. She glanced at the new arrival and remarked loftily, "I s'pose you're Miss Lightfoot from the East!' hurrying to secure the one chair as she proceeded to take off her shoes and put on a pair of white slippers much too small for her.

"I am; Dolly Lightfoot, thank you;" she answered politely, "and this is Miss-

"Oh, thar ain't no gol-darned airs about me, I'm just Nan!"

"Ah, just Nan!" there was a slight suspicion of sarcasm in Dolly's voice as she glanced about for another chair in vain.

Tugging at an unwilling slipper Nan questioned, "I suppose you think you know jest all there is to know about singin'?"

"Well, hardly that, but I am going to do the best I can. I must; I need the money.'

"You need money!" Nan glanced incredulously at the dainty costume of lace and spangles Dolly had disclosed by removing her cloak. A sudden qualm seized poor Nan. Pretty as she was, that seemed unimportant to her when confronted for the first time by that indefinable quality called style-she thought Dolly's gown must have cost hundreds of dollars, for Nan had never heard of bargain counters and their mysteries. As she limped to the piano, a dozen schemes were flitting through her head; but one hope upheld herperhaps Dolly couldn't sing well, after all. Turning some time worn music, she asked, 'Do you sing Cow songs?"

"Certainly not!" answered Dolly indignant-

"Oh! I suppose you sing screechy then; would you like a drink before you begin? singin' is dry work."

"No, I thank you. I shall just run over one or two of my latest songs before the guests arrive; you needn't mind me, I can play for myself quite well;" and as Nan turned away in some disappointment, she added, "What a very unpleasant person!"

Then followed a bad half hour for poor Nan, for Dolly poured forth one after another all of the latest operatic successes. Nan's own bird notes were lovelier far, but she did not know that, and the trills and cadenzas executed by Dolly seemed little short of supernatural. When she finished and turned around Nan could only find voice to say weakly "have a drink now?"

An amused smile flickered over Dolly's face as she replied, "no, not any!"

"Oh, you needn't be so gosh-blamed stuck up," flashed Nan, "if you stay to this ball tonight you'll be glad enough of a bracer before you're two hours older."

A perceptible shudder passed through Dolly's slender frame. There was a long pause. In Nan's face there was growing a desperate purpose that made her pale; suddenly wheeling on her rival she began, "See here, yer don't understand, I admits yer sing like a hull dozen of waterfalls to onct, but I'se got to win that prize tonight an' I ask yer civil to let me do it pleasant like; but if not-" there was an ominous sound in the broken off sentence.

"The idea!" Dolly shrugged her "Yes, and it's my idea. Listen! My Bill got killed last night and I want the plunks to set 'em up good fer his last ride! Thar! now ye knows all my reasons whatever."

"Ah, I heard!" said Dolly softly, "so he

"He was my Bill, and he was awful good to me-he never cuffed me once e cept when he got drunk on town rum. Bill was a good man!"

"What! cuffed you?"

"Yes-ain't yer never got cuffed?"

"Good gracious no!"

"Umph! yer don't know what life is. Say! yer never know how much yer can love a man 'til he licks yer once. Oh dear, this will be Bill's last ball."

"Do you mean to say-" Dolly was getting really frightened, "that they are going to leave the-the body in there while we are-are dancing in here?"

"Sure! Why, Bill's feelin's would be hurt if we didn't. He wuz all-fired fond of dancin' an' the gol-darned'st man fer a jig that ever you see. Poor Bill!"

"But this is horrible."

"But it don't give me courage. It isn't fair! And I'm going to ask Mexican Joe to have itit removed."

"Mexican Joe! He darsn't touch him. It lays twixt him an' Four Finger Pete as to who killed my Bill."

"Oh, it could not have been Joe,-he's so good and kind."

"Oh, ho! that's the way the wind blows-ah, but you're a skittish one not to say so before." A sudden idea seemed to possess Nan, for, whirling about in a sort of Indian dance she almost shouted:

"I've got some papers what Mexican Joe lost once; he set store by 'em I know. I kept 'em cause-well, Bill hed a grudge agin him somehow. I'll go fetch 'em an' give 'em to Joe if ye'll let me win the prize tonight. It was the dream of Bill's life to be buried in a biled shirt, an' to have me drive thro' town in a carriage cryin' behind a great big gol-darned long crape

With flying hair and wildly panting bosom, Nan dashed out into the night, regardless of her white slippers that threatened to bring her to grief at every step. Five minutes later she returned to find Dolly and Mexican Joe in deep consultation. Thrusting the papers into Joe's hands, Nan said in a voice hoarse with emotion:

"Thar! Joe, take em! ef 'twar wrong to keep em blame me, but don't lift yer tongue agin

One glance and Joe surprised his sweetheart by rushing up to Nan and kissing her heartily.

"Why, Nan, gal, these are worth a fortune, an' ef I'd had 'em even late as last week I'd a sold out my interest fer nigh onto nothin' like a plumb fool. They goes to show that I own half the big 'Lucky William Mine' and the assays have just come in and, gals, I'm rich! rich, do you hear?"

Nan was awe stricken for a moment at the mportance of the "papers" she had withheld. 'An' the prize tonight?"

"Shall be yours, Nan, and five hundred dollars added to it. Dolly is goin' to only sing for me henceforard whatever; eh, little sweet-

"God bless yer, Joe. I hope yer wedded bliss will ekal what Bill an' me sperienced. An' say, would yer Song Bird an' yerself like ter ride in the carriage with me when they plants Bill?"

And thus Nan showed her gratitude that Bill's dream could be fullfiled.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY WALTON RIGGS

LL Europe was astir with political intrigue and the corruptions that attend illy governed sections. Assassinations were not frequent although the authorities down to those of minor importance, were constantly receiving threatening letters, and since King Humbert's violent end every country had its corps of detectives who were on the alert to find some clue to the location of the so-called anarchists.

One of the largest American dailies on whose staff I chanced to be at the time, thought by sending a representative incognito across the water some information might be gained which would change the popular idea that America harbored the instigators of all these tremendous life-exterminating plots. And I was chosen to go to Europe for three months and discover what I could in the way of making sensations for our paper.

I decided upon Paris to locate first, as that was the best city to find a bit of all classes. I found lodgings in the Latin Quarter and was SEARS, ROEBUCK & CO., Chicago, Ill. unknown save as "the fcreigne: who writes."

street brawl, in which I cragged a drunken brute away from a little street musician, whom he would have pounded into powder had her screams not alarmed me as I sat in my room three stories above. But such things occur so constantly that one has co learn to get acclimated, and never see and hear, or else be a selfappointed police.

State affairs at this time were very quiet, so quiet too, in fact, were all sorts of malicious doings, it seemed as though a storm must be pending, and it was into this very shower that I longed to plunge, and which eventually I barely escaped.

A few facts I did learn-that through some mysterious way messages of great political importance were daily passing into and through the city. All suspects were examined and occasionally in a woman's cloak, or in some part of a man's clothing was found a bit of lace or something he or she were trying to smuggle; but beyond this nothing written, and nothing could be told verbally because the conspiracy required information which could not be trusted to word of mouth. This I knew from the "To know he's a layin' there so close will nature of affairs and my varied views and opining to the paper, extracts of which appeared in quotations in Paris dailies every now and then with the comment that "A clever man from America would in time do more to thwan the plans of these conspirators than a whole fores of detectives."

I was gaining publicity that I did not want and could not afford to have in my line of buiness just at this time, and I sat in a little wilter shop one evening thinking if it would not be better for me to leave Paris for a little while when a most unusual incident happened. The musicians stopped playing for an intermission while the little tambourine girl gathered to the few coins that were expected. When ebe came to my table she asked if she could not tell me my fortune, and being struck with the beauty of the girl I did not hesitate to let he hold my hand and examine my palm as long as she liked. Presently she began to speak and to my intense amusement, instead of predicting for me she said in a monotone:

"I am Mordante, a Hungarian gypsy, and never forgive a wrong or forget a kindness, and Monsieur was good to me the night the ruffien tried to beat me. The Monsieur does not no member, but I have loved him and followed him for weeks since until I have learned what it is that will make him the most happy and

Just then a waiter who thought she was disturbing me, caught her roughly by the skir, and as he pushed her away she pulled a govgeously colored silken scarf from her neck and tossing it over my head in a banteringly toquettish way, added,

"My heart is wrapped within its folds, Monsieur.'

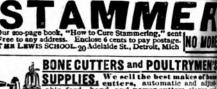

Eagerly I folded the scarf and put it in by inside pocket, nearest my heart, so that sig might see, and with a nod she with her to musician associates passed out into the night to be eulogized only in a newspaper clipping the following morning:

"A gypsy girl, Mordante, probably one of the conspirators, shot at midnight for losing important and complicating papers, and if the right person only finds these he will have mass his name and fortune."

Instinctively my hand went to my pocket that contained the scarf, and the crumple of paper as my hand closed around it told me the depth and value of the heart Mordante has given me.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES E. BARNS.

HE gong sounded. Both sprang to the platform of the car, advancing up that double phalanx of spread newspapers, taking the only two vacant seats almost opposite each other. Dick wiped his forehead, unfolding his evening maze of scareheads and caricature, settling back in reverie over the Wall Street column.

Soon, however, the young broker became conscious of a keen eye fixed upon him. Over the parapet of pages he ventured a sly glance, then caught his breath. The hatband tightened about his moist brow. Above the roar of the up-moving train Dick heard the beatings of his own heart. Before him on the damp sheet there glowed the spirit-picture of a sweettaced young woman in the simple gown of a dollar-drudge. He recognized it.

It was a sensitive, virginal type, quite scarlet with surprise, and she was breathing short and fast as with an inner tumult. The little form was bent slightly foward as when a bird takes flight from a ledge, the curling lashes downdropped against the throbbing cheek. It was Vividly that name conjured an eventful past. Dick closed his eyes and dreamed. He saw again in the clear morning light the old mansion of the crag-point overlooking the warm stretch of Champlain valley. There were winding ways through the wood, over trout-brooks spanned by rustic bridges, and torrents that tore over mossy cascades in apparent haste to reach the sleeping lake below. He recalled, too, the grizzled veteran, the man of millions, blustering, abrupt, piling shilling on shilling in his great granite quarries, and who looked with mingled indifference and contempt upon the promises of young dreamers in the warmth of love's first dawning.

And he recalled too the parting hour-it was Alice's eighteenth birthday-when she told him, as she had been instructed, that with all due regard for his friendly interest, she was destined for a higher career than one of such humble birth and prospects could vouchsafe her; and then he realized for the first time that he had been building high hopes upon illusions that were dispelled with the mere gesture of the parental hand. Without question or argument Dick Ellis had breathed a faint farewell, leaving her there upon the fallen beech-log, she hoping that he would turn about just once and give her a tender glance-a thing which he had never done to this day.

And he recalled how, after packing up his worldly effects in a pocket-parcel and shaking the dust of his native hamlet from his feet forever, he had come to a great metropolis to seek fortune, and how the first tidings of Alice overwhelmed him. She was in London, the guest of a West End society goddess, and betrothed to an Earl. From that day the fading image of Alice lost its power to cheer the battler against great odds even in adversity.

Then came the "black March" of '92 when fortunes went down like tin soldiers to the boom of the bean-cannon, and Wall Street was the abode of fiends. In one corner of a financial oracle were three lines that told of the utter rout and ruin of the quarry-king of the North, and his sudden death following this mortal blow to his pride. Later Dick heard of the broken engagement and the homecoming of the "belle of Champlain."

And now, here she was-the wife of an exalted peer, the leader of a charmed West End circle? No, no; merely another insignificant cog in the great money-mill of the metropolis, with stained fingers that showed familiarity With the ruling-pen and a general aspect of resignation to untoward destiny. A clayfaced Chinaman sat on her right, a Bohemian peasant-type crowding her left with a heavy basket. How tragically the dull insipidity of the dollar-drudges contrasted with the cameo features of that patrician type-the child, of fortune to a higher manner born and so pitiably unequipped amid these surroundings so at variance with her early destiny! For once Dick Ellis forgot his eighths and sixteenths, his cable advices and his prophecies for the morrow. He was alive to the keenest sense of compassion which seemed nevertheless an ignoble emotion after the passing of the greater; yet was he prompted then and there to do what he had long ago vowed that he would never do so long as he lived. But then, since neither the Chinaman nor the peasant-woman vacated to give him the chance, how could he?

Fortune.

A Tramp's Luck and an Energetic Man's Purpose.

It is perhaps true as told that a tramp, searching a garbage barrel for scraps of refuse food, found a fortune in good United States currency. Such a thing may happen.

But the workman who gives up a steady occupation however unremunerative to hunt garbage barrels for a fortune will surely degenerate to a tramp. There is a difference between finding a fortune and founding a fortune. Few men chance upon fortunes. The fortunes we know about are not found but Pierce, Buffalo. N. Y. founded on a certain substantial basis. The a young man who asked, "What is the first Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

requisite to making a fortune?" "The first requisite to making a fortune," said the rich man, "is health." "The idea that fortunes are made suggests toil and industry and skill. Nothing can be made without these. But a weak man cannot toil, and industry is incompatible with ill-health. If you want to be strong remember that all physical strength comes from food and that the amount of strength extracted from food depends upon the ability of the stomach to digest food and assimilate its nutrition. The man who takes care of his digestion is, in general, taking care of every other organ of his body."

SUCCESS OF THE STOMACH.

The merchant who gave the above opinion may not have been much of a physician but he was a good deal of a philosopher. He had seen men with success almost within the grasp, break down because of "stomach trouble." He had theorized the saying that the "weakest must go to the wall," into the saying that "the man with the weakest stomach must go to the wall" because no man is stronger than his stomach. The man who will learn this lesson of success has taken a great stride to his goal. Health is the first prerequisite of success and health in general means a sound stomach and a good digestion.

Look at the logic of the matter. Food is a man's life, his strength. Physical life is sustained by food. But the fact that a thing can be eaten doesn't make it food. Many a physician practising in the tenements of a city says of failing men or women, "What they need is nourishing food." Shipwrecked men eat scraps of leather, the bark of trees, anything to satisfy hunger. But this is not food in any true sense because it contains no nutrition. All food must be considered in relation to its nutritive value. When the stomach and the allied organs of digestion and nutrition are diseased the nutrition contained in food is imperfectly extracted and the body fails of nutrition adequate to its needs. The shipwrecked sailor living upon scraps in which there is no nutrition is on a level with the man who eats abundant nutritious food but whose stomach with its allied organs is diseased and therefore fails to extract from the food eaten the nutrition which is the body's need.

let, those downcast orbs, that mass of wavy brown hair and tightly folded hands over the throbbing bosom! The gateman mouthed some thing and the train slowed. Dick arose with a sigh, but not quickly enough. Alice had sprang before him as if in frantic haste to be well out of the one place in all the world where she wished she were not. Closely he followed, impelled as by a superior force. The crowd closed in behind, forcing him forward. At the door both paused, the man's bent form so close to hers now that she thought she felt his hot breath upon her throbbing neck, and it thrilled her. The train gave a sudden lurch. Up shot the thin hand to the strap above, missing it. Back she fell, and for one delicious moment that cluster of brown ringlets nestled as of yore against the broad shoulder, and his crimson cheek was buried in a maze of fluff and feathers. It was a revelation, like the quick intervention of Providence at the most critical pass in two destinies.

There was a sudden rally, without apologies. The gates opened and the young woman plunged from the car like a phantom, Dick fast in pursuit without knowing why. He was as one hypnotized. Was this indeed the very last time he should ever meet the former darling of his love? Would a nod, a smile be out of place-a glance of the eye to let her know that all was forgiven? But then, why should he vouchsafe it, and how could he do so? That is almost an axiom. How changed was it all now! And yet Dick found himself following whithersoever she led, even as of old, with almost no power within him to stay a step nor turn aside. Suddenly, just as he reached the street, the pursuer uttered a queer exclamation clapping his hand to his throat with almost tragic motion. Too true! His ruby pin, once a crown jewel of an Indian rajah, presented to him by an English nobleman who had been his Wall Street client, and worth a thousand dollars if a farthing, was gone, and Alice was the thief!

There could be no doubt about it, for was there not the evidence before him? Dick was in a quandary, redoubling his steps. The perspiration gathered at the temples and trickled down his crimson cheek. What conspiracy of the guardian destinies had brought to pass this amazing episode, of all times and of all people began the use of it and used it about eight the most dramatic? It was growing darker smiling sarcastically. The detective, however

What was he to do? Dared he steal up and recover his own, almost without her knowing? It seemed the only thing to do; and midway down the quite deserted block he quickened his step, then put forth his hand stealthily.

There was an angry command and a rough hand clapped upon him from behind. Dick struggled aside, and Alice turned with a startled look to discover her lover of old in the firm grip of a towering policeman.

"I admit the evidence," replied the embarrassed captive to the hard accusation. "But if you are looking for the real thief, there she

In benumbing consternation the accused faced the pair, then with the rigidity of offended dignity she exclaimed, gathering closer, 'What do you mean, sir? I-a thief?"

"Unconsciously," said the broker bowing, but, nevertheless, if taking by force and stealth what does not belong to one constitutes a theft, I pronounce you guilty. Reach your hand around to your back hair, and you will find entangled there a ruby scarf pin worth a king's ransom to me. You see, when you fell against me in the 'El-car', the pin caught among the ringlets-

"Oh, Dick, Dick! It is true. How wonderful!" Approaching in all contrition now, the gem gleaming its crimson rays like an inspired drop of blood from the palm of her gloved hand, she added, "It's all a mistake, officer. I am so sorry, Dick, really I am."

"You almost make me wish I were sorry myself, but truly I'm not. Officer, have a cigar. Oh, I say, Alice. Don't run away from me like that." The broker saluted the astonished man in blue and hurried on to the fleeting girl's side. "Alice, Alice!" he called softly. "I have so much to say to you-

She turned upon him with her sweet face expressive of inner tumult. "What is it now?" she murmured in a voice tremulous with tears and just a little reproachful. "Have I stolen anything else of yours?"

"Yes, Alice you have," he answered solemny, "and quite as innocently. But I fear the charming offence is outlawed, it happened so long ago, you know." He took her hand and drew it through his arm, crushing it close to him lest she resist. "At any rate, if all larcenies brought about such a grateful denouement as this-" He paused, turning to glance courage and devotion once more into the downcast face. "Shall we go to the opera to-night, Alice, dear?"

Dr. McGregor and Henry LaCoste.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY FREDERICK E. BURNHAM.

Copyright, 1901, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

NSPECTOR Harvey of the Bank Squad was leisurely returning to police headquarters one afternoon, when his attention was called to a well-dressed gentleman who had every appearance of being some prosperous business or professional man. While at another time the inspector might not have given the man more than a passing thought at most, on this particular day he glanced sharply at him, wheeled and followed, wondering the while what there was about the man that interested him. Before the detective had gone three blocks the light came-the man he was ollowing was a notorious bank robber and sneak thief, for whom the police and detective force of several cities had been searching a year or more.

Just as the man was entering a building the inspector laid his hand on his shoulder, his other hand seeking his own hip pocket, for Henry LaCoste was a desperate man, ready to murder the individual who stood between himself and liberty.

"LaCoste, you are wanted at headquarters." said the detective, tightening his grip on the man's shoulder.

At the first word the detained man leaped as hough stung, but it was only for an instant.

"Errors will occur," said he, his voice admirably controlled, "my card, no doubt, will satisfy you that you are mistaken in your man, sir."

ALEXANDER J. McGREGOR, M. D. 64 LEXINGTON STREET. BROOKLYN, N. Y.

The above was the card which the suspected man politely tendered the inspector, the while was far from being convinced that he had made a mistake. He believed that the man before him was the much wanted Henry LaCoste, and despite the vehement protests of the alleged him was the much wanted Henry LaCoste, and despite the vehement protests of the alleged physician he locked arms with him and started for headquarters.

"An arrest that does you credit, John," said the captain, the prisoner having been positively identified as the notorious bank robber Henry LaCoste. "I shall not forget the service."

ly identified as the notorious bank robber Henry LaCoste. "I shall not forget the service." The following day, however, a most astounding piece of news reached headquarters, something that caused the captain to color clear to the roots of his hair. A dispatch from Philadelphia stated that Henry LaCoste had died six months previous at a hospital in that city, that papers had come to light within a week through the hospital authorities, which proved conclusively that LaCoste would trouble the police no more.

The Captain of Police was convinced, but not Inspector Harvey, and though the prisoner was immediately released from custody, he was immediately released from custody, he made it his business to shadow the man he had arrested, and before a week was over he had learned much of his life, which, while proving that Dr. McGregor's life was not that of an upright man, did not establish that which the inspector believed—that a mistake had been made and that Henry LaCoste was still in the land of the living, passing to and fro among the people as a physician. He learned that Dr. McGregor had had an office on Lexington Street for several years, and this fact staggered the detective, positive as he was that he was right in the arrest which he had made.

The detective acknowledged that he was in error, but having learned somewhat of Dr. McGregor's life during that week, came to the error, but having learned somewhat of Dr. Mc-Gregor's life during that week, came to the conclusion that if the man could not be held as Henry LaCoste, he could be arrested as a criminal who was treading in Henry LaCoste's footsteps. A package of one hundred ten-dollar bills had mysteriously disappeared from the cashier's window at one of the leading banks. No one saw the theft occur and the bank officials were at a loss to account for the disappearance of the money The package was lying pearance of the money The package was lying upon the counter within the wire grating and no person was seen to enter or leave the bank no person was seen to enter or leave the bank between the seeing and missing of the money by the cashier, save a depositor—Doctor Alexander McGregor. Other robberies occurred, some of them bearing all the thumbmarks of Henry LaCoste, and strangely enough Dr. McGregor was close at hand when these latter were committed. That the doctor was the thief, there was no doubt in the inspector's mind; the point was—to catch him in the act. Dr. McGregor had a servant in his employ from whom the detective learned several facts connected with the physician. The detective contrived to see him alone one morning and the information that he gained, while interesting to the detective, shed little light on the case.

"The master is not the man I used to know," said Feeley, the servant, "the doctor is no longer here; some other man is in his place. Nothing is as it was then."

er here; some other man is in his place. Nothing is as it was then."
"I do not understand you," said the detective, "what do you mean when you say that somebody else is here in the doctor's place."
"I mean what I say," replied Feeley, "something strange, something I can't describe, happened here some six months since. I was through with my work and had gone to my room one night feeling at peace with the world. Just as the clocks were striking twelve I heard a slight sound in the hall, and the next instant the laboratory door was softly opened and closed again. The same sound I have heard hundreds of times at all hours of the night, but somehow on this particular night I felt a cold hundreds of times at all hours of the night, but somehow on this particular night I felt a cold shiver go over me and I sat up in bed listening. It was not long before I heard another sound that stirred me as nothing had in the past. A chair was tipped over and I heard master's voice calling as though in great distress. Not stopping to dress I rushed from my room, merely carrying a stove poker, and as I bounded over the stairs I heard master's voice again as though pleading with some one to leave him as though pleading with some one to leave him alone. Not stopping to knock I made bold to enter the room and there found master resting against the fireplace, at least I thought it was master, until he spoke to me. 'Keep out of this room in the future,' said he, advancing to meet me, and frightened by his looks I hurried away.

"The following day this strange man who had taken master's place, who looked like mas-ter, but did not talk or act like him, refused to see any of the patients that came to the office, and from morning till night he sat there by the fire, shaking and shivering, cursing me when-ever I came near."

"Does this man seem to be well supplied with

"Does this man seem to be well supplied with money?" asked the detective, "and does he settle with you as well as your old master?"
"Oh, yes, he always has money, far more than the master I used to know; rolls of bills, and he thinks nothing of slipping an extra five dollars into my hand of a time when he is feeling good-natured, but with it all, I would sooner know one little finger of my old master, than have things as they are."

From the day of this interview with the ser-

Finally things came to a head. A wealthy man had been held up not ten rods from Doctor McGregor's office, and resisting, was mur-dered. The detective was several blocks away, but arrived on the scene in time to see the assassin disappear through the door of Doctor McGregor's office. One glance at the prostrate figure upon the sidewalk told the inspector that the man was dead, a savage knife-thrust having done the work. The first thing to accomplish was the arrest of the murderer before he had an opportunity to escape. It would be dangerous business and the inspector knew enough of desperter was to appreciate his peril but the determinant ness and the inspector knew enough of desperate men to appreciate his peril, but the detective was not the man to flinch, and without hesitation he ran to the rear of the house, aroused Feeley, who was dozing over the fire, and pressed on through the house to the laboratory, followed closely by the servant.

That uneasy, sly and finally murderous gleam had disappeared, and inally murderous gleam had disappeared, and in its place an eye clear and kindly, met the detective's. Then, too, it seemed as though the lines of his face were undergoing a change, for when Feeley returned with a doctor it were as though another had changed places with the wounded man, and Feeley's exclamation of astonishment and delight showed that the detective was not alone in observing this. "My master! My master has returned!" said Feeley, dropping by the wounded man's side, "come back to die," he added as he understood the meaning of the terrible pallor that had overspread the face.

For a moment the dying man was silent, as though unable to complete the sentence he was about to utter.

Death was hovering very closely above its victim, "as Doctor McGregor."

An Unexpected Listener.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ELLA F MOSBY

HE thrilling adventure which my story relates, happened to Mary Page during her second year as a Missionary in the East. It was a hot day; not a breath stirred the great palms in the Sultan's gardens. Mary had been teaching with her father all the morning at the Mission-House and as she sat down in the little American rocking chair that the native children all loved to ride so soon as they grew bold enough to venture, a pang of acute loneliness filled her eyes with burning tears. She could see so clearly the brook that ran from the upland pastures, dewy and fresh, down through the Long Meadow, and hear the song sparrow singing his ecstatic melody.

Her little room was bare and hot, whitewashed for sanitary reasons, the glare burnt her eyes, even though the blinds were down except on the side next to the royal garden. She loved to see the feathery fronds of the palms and the top of the peepeel-tree there and to hear the distant splash of the royal fountains. There was a little door in the wall and often the children of the Sultan's household would be allowed to come with their obsequious dark attendants to the residence of the Missionary whose daughter was permitted to give within the laboratory some one was moving, presumably the murderer, and throwing open the door, the detective advanced with drawn revolver to arrest his man.

With a howl of rage the assassin sprang at the detective, a knife flashing in his right hand. A flash and report from the detective's revolver was the answer, and the man dropped in his tracks.

Summoning Feeley to his assistance, the detective with some difficulty carried the wounded man across the room to the lounge, and having dispatched the servant for a physician, turned his attention to the man he had shot, for in the excitement of the moment he the floor, listened with wide-open eyes and gleaming white teeth.

There was one little boy, Lalli, a beautiful child but not strong, whose litter had been thrown down in some panic during a pilgrim-age to a famous shrine, and who had been bad-ly hurt in the crush that ensued. He could not walk yet, but Dr. Page, at once missionary and physician had him in his care by the especial favor of the Sultan, and hoped much to effect a final cure. He had had a pair of tiny crutches made for the little prince, which he was beginning to use with much dexterity.

Lalli was fond of power and self-indulgent, but he was affectionate, and had a wonderful sensibility to music. However weary Mary was, she would always play for him and try to solace his hours of suffering, and the child had more than once stolen away from his nurses and come to seek her.

A day or two ago an embassy had arrived from one of the "little kings of the East" some royal or sultan of a tiny domain. Mary had been kept awake by the barbaric music of the processions, the buzzing, squeaky, drumming noise the natives, like children delighted with a clatter, call music, and with this mingled deep growls from the animals in two or three strong cages, fastened on bullock carts—the reluctant gift of the jungle to the court. For an hour or so after the torches, musicians and carts had vanished, she heard the thud, thud, of bare feet or the slide of sandals on the streets, and the excited chattering of the natives, pleased with the show. Lalli had not been to see her since. Doubtless he had received special gifts, for his mother was known to be a present favorite. However, he could not long absent himself from the violin.

Mary smiled as she rose and taking down the violin from its place on the wall, began to play a cradle hymn that she had heard her own mother sing often and often in the twilight, a simple melody, but it expressed the longing of a simple and humble soul after the higher things of eternal life, a melody that was half a prayer. Her arm fell to her side and she stood in a reverie, half sad, half sweet, when a sudden sound made her start with terror. She had in a reverie, half sad, half sweet, when a sudden sound made her start with terror. She had left the low window open next to the gardens, and what she heard was the low, frightened cry of a child and the click, click of Lalli's crutches. He was on the window-ledge, and by the aid of one crutch sprang inside. He made one attempt to draw close and fasten the blind, but it was in vain, and he caught Mary's dress with one trembling hand, gazing terrified over his shoulder as if at something that pursued him.

Mary instinctively thrust him behind her for protection, and at the same moment the open-ing was darkened and with a low growl a striped and tawny animal, the Royal Tiger sent to the Sultan and escaped from its cage, leaped into the place the boy had occupied the instant our household cats in the light.

Mary's violin was still in her hand, held against her shoulder in a half-caressing attitude. She remembered having read of the strange influence of music over beasts and as the tiger opened its lips in a savage snarl at Lalli's cry, she drew the bow slowly across the trings and hearn playing a low soft slumber strings and began playing a low, soft slumber

The tiger slowly descended to the floor, and as Mary played, walking to and fro, she con-trived to keep Lalli on the farther side, and to move nearer and nearer the door. The tiger followed her, pacing slowly and at times purfing and rubbing his great head, in evidence of his pleasure, against the folds of her dress.

Mary still played—played lullabies, hymns, melodies of tender and soothing sweetness. She dared not turn her head but she heard the door open and close—Lalli was safe! God be door open and close—Lalli was safe! God be thanked!—but how long could she continue this? Her arm ached, her head whirled, but at this? Her arm ached, her head whiled, but at every sign of relaxation on her part the tiger moved more restlessly. Suddenly the door burst open, something whizzed through the air and she fell back in a dead faint just as the native keepers, summoned by Lalli, secured the power ul brute, struggling with his lasso and growling furiously.

Mary had played before many a "select audience" before, but never had known such approval as her unexpected listener, the Royal Bengal Tiger from the Sultan's gardens, had vouchsafed her.

PEALE'S WASHINGTON AS A YOUTH.

Is generally accepted as a better specidegree of iuxury which was hardly equalled in any part of the world, from his youth up he was surrounded by works of art and as many luxuries as were obtainable in this new world, which may be a surrounded for such things on the markets.

The large picture which is published is known as Washington as a Youth. It is the earliest portrait of Washington as a Youth. It is the ries as were obtainable in this new world, which mainly depended for such things on the markets of London. It was customary in those days, in sending shiploads of tobacco and other produce to England, where the market was, to commission the captain to buy things to bring out on his return voyage; so that in addition to the numerous supplies necessary to the colonists, as they grew richer and in better circumstances, it was customary to furnish the new American homes with objects of art and luxury, books, etc., obtained in London; and even today are to be found both in Virginia and New England, hundreds of objects of art and utility, which were brought out to the colonies from England in the old packet ships.

To resume, then, it must be remembered that

To resume, then, it must be remembered that Washington throughout his life was surrounded by the usual surroundings of culture and refinement. His beautiful estate at Mt. Vernon is today one of the most beautiful sights in America, and shows in its restored condition an idea of what elegance and grandeur it must have had during the life of Washington, when filled with objects of art and value.

It was therefore natural that a man who had become one of the richest proprietors in America.

It was therefore natural that a man who had become one of the richest proprietors in America, and whose fortune would have been large in any part of the world and whose fame as a statesman had reached every part of Europe, should have been the object of every portrait painter of renown. Naturally America in those early days possessed comparatively few artists of great celebrity, but some had attained fame; and to these, and to a few foreigners who came to this side of the water, we are indebted for a number of portraits of this great chieftain. So frequent were the visits of these artists, and so importunate were they, that even Wash-existing:

"I am so hackneyed to the touches of the painter's pencil that I am altogether at the ir beck, and sit like patience on a monument while they are deline at in g the lines of my face. It is a proof of what habit and custom can effect. At first, I was as impatient at the request and as restive under the operation as a colt is of the saddle. The next time I submitted very reluctantly, but with less flouncing. Now, no dray moves more readily to the thill than I do to the painter's chair."

It is certain that from his youth to the very

It is certain that from his youth to the very edge of the grave, his features were reproduced by artists and sculptors of all degrees of fame, who desired to make some lasting memento of his face. It was a task of no little time to paint a good picture, requiring a number of sittings, and then much elaboration in the studio; so that when it is told that there are no less than thirty known to be authentic portraits of Washington, and an innumerable lot of portraits which may have been original or copies of others, or partly original and partly copied, it seems wonderful to think how so busy a man could ever have devoted the time to this occupation. It is certain that for twenty-six years of his life an average of more than one authentic portrait a year was produced from life sittings; and even to this late date, every now and then in some foreign collection will appear some colored or black and white reproduction of these well-known features, which in a way all resemble each other, and yet are strangely dissimilar.

In addition to the numerous paintings, drawings and silhouettes, it must be remembered that there are a large number of more or less authentic busts, bas reliefs and casts of Washington's face. It is certain that from his youth to the very less authentic busts, bas reliefs and casts of Washington's face.

Of this great array of pictures, we can produce only a few. The initial cut at the head of the piece is of the English coat of arms of the Washington's relief. Washington family, which was retained by Washington as a seal for legal papers through-out his life. The Stuart picture, above referred to, is the most world famed portrait of Washington; and is, as above noted, the commonly accepted features of him; but the original was held unfinished through life by Stuart, although he had copied it fully three hundred times, making slight variations from the original un-finished por-trait in the replicas that he finished for various par-ties. Stuart was born in Rhode Island in 1755, and died in Boston in 1828, He was far ahead of other American artists of that period, and especially in portrait painting, in which he excelled. This portrait of Washington, which we which we call Stuart second, was painted at an earlier date than that commonly accepted, and is generally

The large picture which is published is known as Washington as a Youth. It is the earliest portrait of Washington known to exist, and was the first of many Washington pictures painted by a noted American artist by the name of Peale. Peale was a lifelong acquaintance of Washington, and undoubtedly knew his face better than any other artist. So far as can be learned by tradition and writings, the immediate family and friends of Washington considered Peale's likeness unapproached by other artists. In the present picture, Washington is represented in the unform of a Virginia colonel, consisting of a blue coat with

AN ASTHMA CURE AT LAST.

It gives us great pleasure to announce the discovery of a positive cure for Asthma, in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanic product found on the Congo River, West Africa. The cures wrought by it in the worst cases, are really marvelous. Sufferers of twenty to fifty years' standing have been at once restored to health by the Kola Plant. Among others many ministers of the gospel testify to its wonderful powers. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., was perhaps the worst case, and was cured by the Kola Plant after fifty years suffering. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, Washington, D. C., Editor of the Farmers' Magazine, gives similar testimony as do many others. To prove to you beyond doubtits wonderful curative power the Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of Comfort, who suffers from any form of Asthma. They only ask in return that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. You should surely try it, as it costs you nothing.

I will guarantee to cure the worst case of Rheumatism. I do not ask you to send me one cent. Send me your name and address. Chas. L. Frye, 82 Lincoln St., Room 1, Boston, Mass.

A poor, bedridden old woman named Osborn and another poor old body named Sarah Good, who was a kind of a vagrant, were accused of having bewitched the for the crime the following July. But this did not cure the "afflicted children," who conor the crime the following July. But this did not cure the "afflicted children," who continued to scream without apparent cause and do all sorts of strange things. Urged to name those who had bewitched them they named persons of great prominence and the highest character. Among those named by the children was Dame Martha Corey, an elderly woman, the wife of Giles Corey, one of the most prominent men in Salem. She had been outspoken in her denouncement of the folly of anyone believing in anything so absurd as prominent men in Salem. She had been outspoken in her denouncement of the folly of anyone believing in anything so absurd as witchcraft, and this had caused her to be regarded with much disfavor and also with suspicion. She was promptly arrested when the "afflicted children" accused her of having bewitched them, and when brought into the presence of the children they immediately began to scream as if in great agony, as well they might had they had any realizing sense of all that they were bringing upon the good woman. Martha Corey was tried, and even her own husband gave evidence that helped to condemn her. She was executed and, later, her husband was arrested for witchcraft and he too suffered death. Eight persons were executed on Gallows Hill one September day in the year 1692, but we are glad to record that they were the last persons executed in the colony, although others were arrested and thrown into prison. The craze lasted for about six months, but during that short time hundreds of persons were thrown into jail and unspeakable suffering was caused in many homes.

The strange conduct of the two little girls who had caused so many arrests was still, in the minds of many hunter of the strange conduct of the two little girls who had caused so many arrests was still, in

The strange conduct of the two little girls who had caused so many arrests was still, in the minds of many, unaccounted for, but it is now supposed that it was a sort of hysteria caused by nervousness and excitement. Rumors of witchcraft were afloat and the children had heard their elders talking of the strange things done by those supposed to be bewitched. It is probable that the nervous and excited children had lain awake nights thinking of all they had heard, and they no doubt thought they were

had lain awake nights thinking of all they had heard, and they no doubt thought they were really bewitched. It is to the credit of some of those who were the most pronounced believers in the delusion that they afterward confessed publicly their profound regret for any part that they had had in the conviction of the supposed witches, and they sincerely mourned the lamentable results of their folly.

There is much to be recorded to the credit of Salem. None of the people were more patriotic or courageous than were the people of Salem in the time of the Revolution. They vigorously opposed the unjust Stamp Act, and they were among the first to make armed resistance against the British government when the injustice and oppression government when the injustice and oppression of that government became unbearable. The old town has been visited by Washington, Lafayette and many of the most distinguished persons connected with American history.

his wife lived before her marriage, the house in which he wrote his most famous book, the "House of the Seven Gables" that gave the title to one of his stories, and the custom house in which he was employed while he was writing that book.

One may see the house in which Hawthorne's mother lived when she became a widow with several little children. It was of one of the rooms of this house that Hawthorne wrote in after years: "If ever I should have a biographer, he ought to make great mention of this chamber in my memoirs, because so much of after years: "If ever I should have a blographer, he ought to make great mention of this chamber in my memoirs, because so much of my lonely youth wasted here, and here my mind and character were formed; and here I have been glad and hopeful, and here I have been despondent. And here I sat a long, long time, waiting patiently for the world to know me, and sometimes wondering why it did not know me sooner, or whether it would ever know me at all—at least until I were in my grave. By and by the world found me out in my lonely chamber, and called me forth, not indeed, with a loud roar of acclamation, but rather with a still, small voice, and forth I went, but found nothing in the world that I thought preferable to my old solitude."

The museums of Salem are rich in relics of bygone days, and there is no town in America in which the visitor, young or old, can spend a day with greater interest or profit. One must be charmed with the quaintness that still lingers in the older parts of the town, and with the wonderful beauty of the great Atlantic as seen from Salem's rocky shores.

When is a President Elected?

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE newspapers all said that William McKinley was re-elected president of the United States last November. Was this really so? Few this really so? Few people stop to think of, even if they know anything about, the complicated machinery which really elects the president of this country.

What were really elected in November what were really elected in November were the electors who are to elect the president. These men for each state are equal in number, as most persons know, to the number of representatives and senators which that state has in Congress. That is, the great state of New York has thirty-That is, the great state of New York has thirty-four congressmen and two senators, and hence has thirty-six electors in the electoral college, as the body is called which elects the chief magistrate. A state which has only one con-gressman has three electors, one for that official and one for each of its two senators.

The way in which these electors shall vote The way in which these electors shall vote has been carefully directed by the Constitution. It is also stipulated that no senator, or congressman, or person holding a position of trust or profit under the United States government can be chosen as an elector.

These electors meet in their own states and vote for president and vice president there.

These electors need in their own states and vote for president and vice president there. The Constitution prescribes that at least one of the men they vote for shall not live in the same state as the men voting. This removes the possibility of having the president and vice president there. dent come from the same state. They vote by ballot, and after they have voted must make lists of the result of the votes. These lists must be signed, sealed and disposed of as folmust be signed, sealed and disposed of as follows:

The electors must make three of these lists, which are all signed and certified to, and then sealed up separately. The electors then choose one of their number who is to travel to Washington and in person deliver one of the lists to the President of the Senate. The second list is sent to the same official through the regular channels of the Post Office, and the third is delivered to the judge of the district in which the electors meet. Being appointed messenger to carry the vote to the President of the Senate is no empty honor, since the man who carries it receives "twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance by the most usual road it receives "twenty-five cents for every fille of the estimated distance by the most usual road from the place of meeting of the electors to the seat of government of the United States." The bill of the men who bring the votes of Wash-ington and Oregon is no small one, while if the time ever comes that Alaska, the Sandwich Islands and the Philippines are entitled to rep-resentation, even much greater amounts will be required.

The law provides that the electors must meet

The law provides that the electors must meet and vote on the second Monday in January following their appointment by the people at what is usually known as the "November presidential election." The law also provides that Congress must be in session on the second Wednesday in Exhibitation of the proving this meet-Wednesday in February following this meeting of the electors. The members of the Senate and the House of Representatives meet together on that day, at 1 P. M., in the hall of the House of Representatives. The President of the Senate presides over this union meeting. of the Senate presides over this union meeting. Two tellers are appointed on behalf of each branch of Congress. The President of the Senate opens all of the returns which have been brought to him and hands the papers to these four tellers. They arrange the papers in alphabetical order, so that the count will begin with letter A. The tellers then read the lists alphabetical order, so that the count will begin with letter A. The tellers then read the lists aloud and make a report to the presiding officer of the results. This officer then declares who is elected president and vice president of the United States.

Usually, of course, this counting in Washington is only a cut-and-dried affair, but this has not always been the case.

Previous to 1804 the electors voted or two persons as candidates for president. The one who revious to look the electors voted or two persons as candidates for president. The one who received the highest number of votes became president, and the one who had the second highest number became vice president. In 1804 the Constitution was amended so that the electors voted for both of the officers separately.

electors voted for both of the officers separately. The Constitution provides that if the electors do not succeed in electing a candidate, the election passes into Congress. In 1824 there was no choice and the House of Representatives elected Adams. Various other complications have arisen at different times. In 1817 objection was made to admitting the vote of the State of Indiana, on the ground that this was not a state at the time the electors were chosen although afterwards becoming so. The was not a state at the time the electors were chosen, although afterwards becoming so. The vote was finally admitted. In 1857 the vote of Wisconsin was objected to because on account of a violent snow storm in that state the election was held on the day following the one appointed by law. In this case, also, the vote was finally admitted. This was when Buchanan was a candidate.

In 1872, General Grant and Horace Greely were the candidates. Greely died before the were the candidates. Greely died before the time in 1873 when the votes were to be counted, and objection was made to counting the votes cast for him on this account. At that time the Senate and the House disagreed as to which course was the right one to follow in this matter.

course was the right one to follow in this matter.

The closest contest in the history of the country was in 1876, when Hayes and Tilden were the candidates. There was a dispute over the votes of Florida, Louisiana, Oregon and South Carolina. The dispute was referred by Congress to an electoral commission of eight republicans and seven democrats, which by a strict party vote declared all of the doubtful states republican. The closeness of the contest can be seen from the fact that this decision gave Hayes only 185 votes while Tilden had 184. Every one who remembers the state of uncertainty under which the country labored through all the long winter while this contest was being decided, will rejoice that the election just passed was so conclusive that the matter was settled once for all. once for all.

iures of distorted cupids or other sentimental devices.

In this factory the busiest month is January, but 400 girls and men are employed the entire year in making these things which are of value only for one day.

There are three classes, therefore three departments; lace, novelty and comic.

In the lace-room is a unique machine; a cylinder containing the design is inserted under which passes the paper which is cut and embossed as it revolves. The operator pulls out these strips of lace paper by the yard which are then cut into sections and pasted on cards. There are anywhere from 100 to 200 different designs ranging in price from $.02 to $.50.

The novelty-room employs 30 or 40 girls and often 20 different hands are employed in the manufacture of one valentine. These novelties are more expensive than the lace-paper, being made of silk, satin or celluloid; of these there are 100 different kinds varying from $.50 to $5.00. Last year and the year before there were thousands made to be sent to Cuba, Porto Rico and to the Philippines.

The third variety, comic, is to the refined mind a waste of money. Yet it is computed that 20,000,000 of them are sent annually.

In the department for making these there are anumber of presses where thousands of the 500 different designs are printed each hour.

There are two men employed in designing them. The artist is a magazine illustrator, and Comics are most popular in the west. The sale in New England and the south being comparatively small.

The trans-continental freight is so high that commerce for San Francisco is shipped by sailing vessels around Cape Horn, from four to six months ahead of time. These "penny-dreadfuls" are comical only to the sender, and to the recipient only offensive.

If we would remember the 14th of February in any way-out of respect to Saint Valentine let us distribute that day, instead of these vulgar paper trifles, words of good-will, that there may be more rather than less sunshine.

The Salt Fish Industry.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

Known from one end of the earth to the other for its fishing industries. A city of brine and salt. Its odor reaches the city limits are touched, and the word Gloucesthe lips of the stranger.

and the word Gloucester springs unbidden to the lips of the stranger. The writer spent a day recently among the fish-houses and wharves that form an almost unbroken line along the water front, and through the courtesy of several merchants gainted an excellent idea of the manner in which the salt fish business is carried on today.

I learned that most of the firms engaged in the curing of fish own from three to a dozen ressels which constantly ply between the port and the fishing-grounds. There are the "shackers," or hand-line, those carrying trawls and the "bankers." The first two make trips of from three to four weeks and carry ice, while the latter are gone from three to six months and carry salt.

the latter are gone from three to six months and carry salt.

It is customary aboard the "shackers" to cut the tongues from the fish as fast as they are taught, thus bleeding them and at the same time furnishing a convenient means of keeping account of each man's catch. These fish are considered the finest brought in, the bleeding producing a whiter fish.

The principal fish brought into Gloucester are cod, haddock, hake, pollock, cusk, mackerel, halibut and herring. Of these, the first five are cured in two ways—dry salted and pickled. The dry salted come in all salted; are weighed and piled in a high pile. As soon as convenient they are placed upon the flakes, (long racks) and covered with cotton cloth, held by frames about a foot from the fish, thus protecting them from the direct rays of the sun; here they remain from two to four days, according to the weather conditions. The fish are next wheeled under cover and piled up ugain where they sweat for forty-eight hours, after which they are placed again upon the flakes and aired for another day; they are then ready for the market.

fakes and aired for another day; they are then ready for the market.

The pickled cured are weighed as soon as they are landed at the wharf and placed in large boxes where they are washed. They are next packed in hogsheads or "butts" as the fishermen term them, first a layer of fish and then a layer of salt; twenty-four hours later these hogsheads are full of strong brine, the fish making its own brine. The fish remain in this pickle from ten days to five months, according to the wants of the firm. When it is deemed advisable to complete the curing they are taken out of the brine and piled up for forty-eight hours. From one to two days on the flakes completes the process and this kind is ready for shipment.

Halibut are brought in fresh, the long bone cut out, and the sides intended for smoking placed in pickle where they remain from ten days to a fortnight. These strips are hung in the smoke-house and a fire of chips and sawdust produces a dense smoke which cures the oduces a dense smoke which cures the dust produces a dense smoke which halibut in from two to four days.

Mackerel are generally seined today. A school of the fish is sighted and a net perhaps two hundred and twenty-five fathoms long and one hundred fathoms deep is placed about it. Sometimes the fish are too quick for the fishermen and escape before the net can be closed up; at other times a catch is made amounting to several hundred barrels. The mackerel are split down the back and salted in barrels in much the same manner as the fish already much the same manner as the fish already described.

Herring are both smoked and salted, the process being much the same as that already described relating to halibut and mackerel, save that in both cases they are cured whole.

Within a few years an extensive business has grown up hand in hand with the salt fish industry; I refer to the preparing of boneless fish. The fish comes to the firm pickled cured, only this kind being suitable for this purpose. Each fish is skinned and the backbone removed, after which the fins are pulled out, and if the fish is to be sold under the head of absolutely boneless fish, short bones that were not removed at first are cut out. A machine absolutely boneless hish, short bones that were not removed at first are cut out. A machine cuts the fish up into oblong strips and these pieces are sent to a room where women and girls pack it into iron moulds, and a pressure of over a ton produces a compact brick of one, two or three pounds weight, as the case may be. It is then packed in boyes and shipped is then packed in boxes and shipped.

It is not many years since the government paid a bounty to every man that shipped aboard a fishing vessel for a period of four months or more, but though this has been done away with, there is little difficulty experienced in securing men to make up a crew. The business is a dangerous one and full of hardships, but going as the men do on shares, the chance of earning large dividends is too much for the fisherman, and whatever the dangers he laughs

George B. Wright Discovers a Cure for Lost Manhood and Sends it Free to Every Sufferer Who Will Write For It.

Gratitude is one of the noblest impulses of the human heart, and in few instances has this fine quality been so conspicuously exemplified as in the case of George B. Wright, of Marshall.

Mr. Wright is a merchant and well known citizen of Marshall, Mich., who was permanently cured of lost manhood and nervous debility after declining health for years. He now devotes his life to helping other men who suffer as he once suffered. Mr. Wright offers to send the medical prescription that effected a cure in his case to every reader of COMFORT who is suffering to-day as he suffered. All who will drop him a letter asking for a copy of the prescription will receive it by return mail free of charge.

The following editorial by A. N. Tally, M. D., regarding Mr. Wright's prescription for lost manhood, appeared in the December issue of the United States Health Reports, published at Washington, D. C.:

We, as the highest American authority on all matters of Health, Sanitation and Hygiene, are constantly receiving letters of inquiry about a sure as effect follows cause, do men live to repent their follies and indiscretions in weakness and suffering. The tortured sufferer may bear no tell-tale marks of ruin upon his face to betray his lost manhood. He goes to his grave a human wreck, and never tells of his sufferings for fear of shame. Such mental anguish at times drives him to the verge of desperation, and he is easy prey for those vultures in human form—quack doctors—who hold out alluring hopes of cure only to disappoint, and after robbing him of his money, plunge him into absolute despair.

No one can appreciate these horrors of lost manhood except he who has suffered them. No one can help such sufferers except he who knows a cure and has himself been restored to full manhood. A notable cure of lost manhood in an extreme case was effected in the person of George B. Wright, a music dealer and well known citizen of Marshall, Mich. Mr. Wright for years suffered the agony of lost vital power. He saw his physical power go from him as the result of insidious disease, until he was reduced to a condition of senility, and the best doctors in the country gave him up to die.

Like many others, he tried the various remedies offered by specialists for the treatment of weaknesses peculiar to men, and it was this experience that drove him to a little study and research for his own benefit.

He asserts that his 10 years' suffering, both mentally and physically, was turned to unbounded joy in a single night through a rare combination of medicines that literally made him young again. It is the prescription of this discovery that his enthusiasm leads him to offer free to any man, young or old, who feels that his animation or the fire of ambition has left him and needs something that will brace him up and enable him to be prepared for any undertaking which may present itself.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and on the roll of our country's history would be obliterated.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and it seems quite probable that any man who believes himself to be weak may profit by sending for his free prescription. Many people wonder how he can afford to send this prescription for undertaking which may present itself.

There is no question but what in his individual case the results were just as described, and it seems quite probable that any man who believes himself to be weak may profit by sending for his free prescription. Many people wonder how he can afford to send this prescription free, but it costs him little to do so, and he feels a philanthropic interest giving weak men an opportunity to cure themselves.

Had all the newcomers to America pursued this fair and just policy many a fearful massacre might have been averted, and many a blot on the roll of our country's history would be oblighted.

In June of the year 1629 the population of Salem, or Naumkeag, was more than doubled by the arrival of four Non-conformist ministers and more than two hundred immigrants, but later about one hundred left Salem and founded Charlestown, now one of the largest suburbs of Boston. Soon after the arrival of the ministers referred to the first church was organized of Boston. Soon after the arrival of the ministers referred to the first church was organized and the Rev. Samuel Skelton was made pastor, while the Rev. Francis Higginson was made teacher or assistant pastor, for it was for a long time customary to elect with the pastor a teacher or assistant pastor. Governor Bradford came from Plymouth to assist at the installation of Mr. Skelton, and thirty persons signed the covenant of the First Church of Salem. This may be regarded as one of the most important events in the religious development of our country.

called to the duty of listening to the sermon by having the fox's tail tickle their faces. No matter how many hours long the sermon may have been it was expected that even the small boys and girls should give close attention to it. In 1634 there came to Salem that remarkable man, Roger Williams, afterward the founder of Rhode Island. It was Roger Williams who aroused the antagonism of the authorities and of even the ministers by declaring that 'no human power has the right to intermeddle in matters of conscience and that neither church nor state, neither bishop nor king, may prescribe the smallest iota of religious faith. Man is responsible to God alone." He tried to impress upon his hearers a sense of this responsibility to God, and he left a never-to-be-forgotten impression on the religious history of our country. After the death of Mr. Higginson Roger Williams became minister of the First Church in Salem. He remained pastor of the church until he was banished from Salem by the General Court because of his outspoken utterances regarding the authority of the magischurch until he was banished from Salem by the General Court because of his outspoken utterances regarding the authority of the magistrates. One may still see in Salem the dwelling house of Roger Williams, but only the inner timbers belong to the original house which is known as the Witch House, because there lived in it during the time of the witchcraft delusion Judge Corwin, before whom some of the supposed witches were tried in this house.

No lover of the good name of his country can recall the great witchcraft delusion without a feeling of sorrow and shame that such scenes could have been enacted in our country as were enacted in Salem. But superstition ran rampant in both the Old and New England at that time, and some strange and evil power, seemed pant in both the Old and New England at that time, and some strange and evil power seemed to have taken possession of the imagination of even the best and wisest men in both countries. No one can doubt that the people of those days were sincere in their belief in witchcraft, but this fact does not lessen our regret, nor did it lessen the sufferings of the nineteen persons hanged on Gallows Hill because they were supposed to be witches. It should be remembered, however, that Blackstone, Matthew Hale, Baccon and other of the most prominent legal authorities had declared that witchcraft was a real thing and they had given decisions against those accused of it. and the wisest men in both England and America were firm believers in it, and Governors Endicott, Winthrop and Bradstreet had sentenced witches to death. The famous Cotton Mather had published a book proving, or seeming to prove, the actual existence of witchcraft and the entire sentiment of the time was in favor of the belief in this monstrous folly. It was in the year 1691, when Salem was affourishing town of nearly two thousand inhabitants, that the little daughter of the Rev. Samuel Parris and his little niece, Abby Williams, girls of nine and eleven years, were supposed to have been bewitched because of their strange actions. They would crawl under tables shrieking and acting as if they were in the greatest distress. They would jump up and down screaming at the top of their voices and conducted themselves in a manner that would have caused the bringing forth of the rod of correction had they lived in a latter day. But instead of the rod and a much needed command to stop such nonsense, a conference of (CONTINUED ON PAGE 6) town, but its aspect today is one of peace and prosperity.

The history of the old town of Salem dates back to the year 1626, when one Roger Conant and a few English farmers and fishermen came up from the dreary Cape Ann region to "view the land" and perhaps begin a new settlement if their discoveries warranted them in doing so. These exploring wayfarers found that the Indians called the tract of land on which Salem stands and the surrounding country Naumstands and the surrounding country Naum-keag. Two years later there came to Naumkeag the noted Captain John Endicott with about one hundred followers and a charter from the English company that laid claim to the terri-English company that laid claim to the terri-tory. Within less than a year there had been "a faire house newly built for the governor," and a number of other rough but comfortable houses had been built, for the governor was a man of energy and his followers were industrious and ambitious men and deeply pious withal. The founders of the town were eager that it should be a goodly place, and there was not among all the Puritans then in America a man of more serious and genuine religious. not among all the Puritans then in America a man of more serious and genuine religious principles than Governor John Endicott. He had the full sympathy of the English company in his efforts to give a deeply religious tone to the community, as we may know from the fact that the directors of the company sent him the following instructions regarding the proper observance of the Sabbath:

"To the end the Sabbath may be celebrated in a religious manner, we appoint that all that

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: Welcome February! Dear to the heart every loyal American as the birth month of the "Father of His Country" and doubly dear this year because we ust (December 12, 1900) celebrated the hundredth anniversary of the removal of the seat of Government from Philadelphia to the new city, then just laid out for the express purpose of a capital for the United States and called by the immortal name of the man who was then and is still "First in the hearts of his countrymen". George Washington.

To realize how that city has developed in the single century which has elapsed since its inception one has only to read of the state of Pennsylvania Avenue in those days-a mere bog with no sidewalks and no drainage, with cows, horses, pigs and chickens turned loose upon it, and then contrast it with the beautiful city of today with its broad, chalt, tree-shaded avenues, its stately buildings and its magnificent parks. Surely we have every reason to be proud of our growth as a nation, for the improvement here is only in step with the onward strides of the whole country.

Our first letter today is on Oregon fish and fishing, and the author says:
"In that beautiful poem, 'Thanatopsis', Bryant, the author, said,

'Or lose thyself in the continuous woods Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound Save his own dashings—'

These are beautiful words in a beautiful poem, t could the Columbia river, which he calls the

TROUT FISHING IN OREGON.

Oregon, hear today, it would hear something more than its 'own dashings'. It would hear not only the shrieks of steamboats and locomotives and the general din of civilization, but also the constant dip! dip! dip! of many fishwheels, revolving downstream, and turned by its swiftly flowing current. These wheels remind one of whirling fluttermills placed in creeks by small boys. They are each strongly hung at the end of a large flat-boat, and revolve on a sort of double spindle like the wheel of a wheelbarrow. Imagine three of the ordinary tops of covered buggies arranged an equal distance apart, in circular formation, and revolving on a double spindle, so that the downward current of the water strikes the back of each cover, taking it under and up again, and you have a pretty good ides of what a fishwheel looks like in action. Of course wire netting is used instead of the oilcoth of the buggy cover, and as the salmon come up the stream and the wheel turns down tream, they run unconsciously into these revolving baskets, and are whirled up in a half circle and dropped into a trough, down which they slide into a hollowed part of the boat.

"Columbia river salmon are the finest in the world, and thousands of dollars' worth are taken yearly in this way. An equal or perhaps a greater number are dragged out with seines; but one of the easiest and best methods of taking salmon is with a gill net. A net probably a hundred feet long and some ten or twelve feet deep is knitted and set in the water, floated by wooden corks, and having a lead line to hold it stiff in the water. As the salmon come up stream they run their heads into the meshes of these nets, and are like spears thrown into soft wood. The spear will penetrate all right, but in pulling it out the barbs catch, and extrication is difficult. So with the salmon. If he attempts to back out his gills spread and hold him fast. He cannot go forward for his body grows larger from the head back to the middle fin. When a salmon gets into one of these nets, the corks directly over him on the surface of the water will droop lower than the others, and an experienced fisherman can often count his fish by the number of drooping corks.

"Trout fishing in Oregon is the finest sport imaginable. Take your bamboo fishing rod, flybook, and a general equipment, and go back where a blue stream comes laughing out of the mountains, and if you are any kind of a fisherman whatever you will soon be in a sort of private dreamland. Drop a fly hook on the water and turn somersaults, and the hook will quickly go under in a hungry mouth. Pull that one out and drop him struggling into your basket, then repeat the cast, and if luck does not desert you your basket will soon grow burdensome with its weight of speckled beauties.

"Rudyard Kipling gives in his American Notes a vivid description of a day's fishing which he had on the Clackamas, a beautiful little Oregon stream, in which he gives his opinion that as a sport the world offers no better."

Geo. Jones, Roseburg, Oregon.

I think all lovers of boys-certainly all who wish to see them develop into good, honorable menwill be interested in the following letter.

JUNIOR REPUBLIC DOLLAR

"At Annapolis Junction, about half way between Washington and Baltimore, has been established a branch of the well-known Boys' Republic of Freeville, New York. Upon our visit there, last spring, we were met at the station by Mr. Rogers, the superintendent, who had brought conveyances to take us to the farm where the Republic has its home. After a ride of about twenty minutes through country roads bordered with broad stretches of fields and shady woods, the carriage drove up before the farmhouse. It was a low, old-fashioned building, shaded in front with magilicent oak trees; all around, to an extent of fifty acres, stretched the farm lands, now breen with newly sprouted vegetation, now brown where it was freshly plowed. To the east of the house we could see a young peach orchard, which, Mr. Rogers said, had been newly planted by the boys. "The idea of the Republic seems to be to make the boys into good citizens by taking them away from city temptations, giving them plenty of health-giving outdoor work, teaching them independence by requiring that they work for what they have, and, finally, teaching them their country's laws and government by having them form themselves into a republic modelled on our own. So far, both here and in Freeville, the plan has worked with wonderful success.

"At the time of my visit twenty boys were living here. They came from Washington and Baltimore and are children whose parents are either unable or unfit to give them proper care and training. Sometimes they are truants from school or have been up once in the Police Court for a petty offence: but the Republic is in no sense a reformatory. When a boy enters the Republic, regular work is assigned to him, for which he is paid at the rate of ten cents an hour. The work consists of some hoeing, weeding, some housework and, in fact, all the lighter farm work, the heavier part being done of necessity by grown men. From two to three hours of each day are spent in the schoolroom and for this time it has been found necessary to pay the boys.

mistaken, one fifth of those awarded under the Maryland laws. On the whole, the theory and practice of the Boys' Republic seem eminently calculated to turn out intelligent and self-respecting citizens of the larger Republic."

ALICE PIERSON, Washington, D. C. From Michigan to Mexico is a long step, and from a mint farm to a Mexican Cathedral and the scene of Mexican bull-fights is a decided change in the program.

"Just across the Rio Grande from El Paso and connected with it by the international bridge is Juarez, the city of adobe. One beautiful day while attending the Chautauqua at El Paso, I took the street car to visit Juarez. The cars are propelled by lazy mules and driven by uncleanly looking Mavicany.

"The boundary river of our Lone Star state I had "The boundary river of our Lone Star state I had supposed to be a very large stream, but to my surprise I found it to be but a paltry little rivulet over which one could step. It is true that four days before it had been a foaming torrent reaching from bank to bank, but the tillers of the soil soon made use of its waters, as irrigation is necessary to obtain any produce.

CONDITIONS.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to Comfort Palmistry Club. Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank

for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carfully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putly is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

HAVE a long list of questions to answer this month which I will proceed to do Does a star on the end of a head line always signify hereditary insanity? Supposing the head line in the right hand ends thus on the Mount of the Moon, while on the left is found a square enclosing the star, crossing the head-line and resting on the life-line? No. The star on the head-line does not always signify insanity but signifies some trouble or grief connected with the head, unless counteracted by some other signs in the head, such as the square enclosing the star spoken of. Of course all bad signs are modified by the appearance of good ones in the hands and the reader must use his judgment in regard to them.

As I have explained many times, these must be corroborated by marriage lines on the fate line or life line. The three squares which ap-pear at the break of the head line or just above it offset the bad effects of the break, but if the fate line starts up again clear and distinct to the base of the second finger that gives excel-lent luck and brings good fortune to the sub-ject.

They may be branches of the fate or life lines, or they may be merely chance lines and their reading would depend a great deal upon the other marks on the hand. They are just as likely to be good lines as bad ones, but they have no names. The black spot on any line is always a bad sign.

The next correspondent seems to have confused the marriage lines with the heart lines. They are not at all the same thing. Another reader writes to ask if I could give lessons by mail and at what price. I have had several such inquiries but have already repeatedly stated in this column that I could not undertake anything of this kind. The best way to learn Palmistry is to study under some competent teacher and practice on the actual hand. If this cannot be done I should advise the purchasing of Cheiro's Book of the Hand, and after that is thoroughly learned to send for Heron-Allen's Manuel of Cheirosophy. The study of these two books with the requisite amount of practice in reading hands, will make any one a good palmist, although some will have a natural gift at it which others will lack.

"Nora C." asks several questions connected with the palms which she encloses. First what lines or significations determine the profession for which a person is best adapted? First examine the hand as to its shape and quality. A hand with conical finger-tips whose mounts and lines show a great deal of idealism and artistic tendency will make an artist, or if the Mount of Venus is highly developed, a musician. Study the books to learn these different significations, indicated by the shape of the hand. The lines are considered afterwards in a general reading.

What is signified when the life and head line goes on and divides under the Mount of Saturn, one branch going to the Mount of Mars, line goes on and divides under the Mount of Saturn, one branch going to the Mount of Mars, and other towards the wrist? These lines in left hand are not connected.

The mingling of the head and life lines, as in this hand, means that this life has been very much kept in the background and that the subject has not had the courage and encourage-ment which she ought to have had. She lacks self-confidence, is naturally bashful and will never be a reader unless she overcomes these "Constant reader" asks what does a short line mean midway between the heart and head line? and then again when the short line has an island on it? This is a chance line, and should be read according to the lines of the other parts of the hand. It may mean a voyage, G it parts of the hand. It may mean a voyage, Oit may mean an affair of the heart. An island; always one of two things. Heron-Allen say: "it is either the mark of something disgraceful, or else it betrays an hereditary evil. It is the more an hereditary weakness of the head, or on the line of heart it betrays an hereditary heart disease," and so on.

As for the disgraceful indication of the island, it should be taken to mean more properly that it should be taken to mean more properly that the chance, i. e., the temptation, will occur; but a long line of head and a strong phalanx of will on the thumb will always annul the most

On the line of head, if it occurs on the Plain of Mars, it shows a murderous tendency; if beyond the Plain of Mars, it betrays evil thoughts. On a good hand it will merely indicate hereditary head weakness.

OLD is the finish used upon all gowns no matter what wear matter what we are they are intended for be it a filmy evening frock or a severe tail-or made, even the separate waists show an elaborate glinting and glistening of gold and most won-derful, it seems to harmonize with all sorts of material. Apropos of gold trimming, I saw an exquisite separate waist made of ivory white Liberty satin laid in the tiniest of tucks each laid in opposite directions so as to give the idea of box-pleats stitched box-pleats stitched along the edges. The front is pouched considerably and the back drawn down simply. Three empiecements of finest rose-bud point lace are used as the decoration, one in the center, reaching from the throat to the bust and one on each shoulder. French knots of gold are introduced in the pattern of the lace, while a row of gold braid outlines the edges. Tiny gold buttons are used to close the front, and to decorate the loose cuffs of the sleeves which are tucked also.

The widest sort of material is required for the newest skirt model, as it has but two seams, one at the front, and one at the back, with a narrow fitted flounce running across the front, from side to side when it vanishes into nothing. This is called the seamless skirt and is the very latest cry.

Returning to the subject of gold trimmings, the manufacturers have produced marvelous things in woven gold gauzes fit to adorn the fairies. For evening dresses these materials of gold mixed with tulle or chiffon and covered with applications of Chantilly laces are the height of fashion. As transparencies over a ground of silk, and veiled with black or white mousseline de soie, they are remarkably effective. Muslins for the coming season are also showing stripes of patterns in gold thread.

I have seen some lovely toques. The upper part of one was made of an enormous rose of gold muslin, set upon a frame of draped tulle, the turned up side of the toque showing a black feather and a white feather, drooping over the hair.

Taffeta dresses are all the rage. The skirts are trimmed round the bottom with several rows of velvet ribbon of different widths, the style of our grandmothers, and the corsages are ornamented with muslins, lace and embroiderstyle of our grandmothers, and the corsages are ornamented with muslins, lace and embroider-les. Short sleeves, in the Louis XVI. style, with "jabots" of lace and muslin stopping at the elbow, are worn with these toilettes, and the general effect is completed by a charming hat in the same style, made of tulle embroidered with gold and lace and having a wreath of roses and a feather drooping over the hair.

A picturesque spring hat is of sky blue chenille, having a wreath of panne violets and a trimming of black velvet.

A charming dinner gown for a half-mourning outfit is of white Liberty silk with the entire skirt trimmed with applications of black lace, surrounding clusters of violet blossoms sewed closely to the skirt. Over the whole is a sprink-ling of lusterless jets. The corsage is covered with the same design, and pouches in front to give the long-waisted effect. The violets that finish the decolletage are loosened to hang a trifle from the stems and are mixed with a rope of violet and white mousseline de soie twisted softly about the top of the corsage. The close elbow sleeves are covered with the embroidery of black lace and appliqued violets, and are oddly finished at the bottom by a loosely twisted rope of the mousseline de soie, with a loose bunch of the violets hanging at the outside of the arm. Although the foundation of this gown is white, the effect is black and violet. There is always a question as to how to finish a chemisette for a jacket suit. Exceedingly high or elaborate neck effects are not well regarded for spring wear and, of course, a plain choker, with no ornamention at all, is equally out of the question. A pretty idea is a chemisette of tucked white satin with a high turnover collar, what is called the Directoire collar of the same stuff. The collar may be effectively edged with a narrow line of black velvet. A pretty sleeve to a short jacket has the cloth ly edged with a narrow line of black velvet.

A pretty sleeve to a short jacket has the cloth forming the bell sleeve to just below the elbow. This is met by a double puff of velvet in same color. The jacket is short in front, showing a girdle of velvet laid in several flat pleats. It closes in a diagonal line across the breast, with clusters of small buttons, and is provided with small revers. An odd feature of the gown is a straight fold of cloth making the belt under the loose pleats that form the girdle. The skirt is the model mentioned here, and is circular in form; though of course, much more bouffant at form; though of course, much more bouffant at circular skirts. There are so many devices by which one may use the bolero in a disbolero in a disguised for m.

The blouse bodice, a garment with jacket sides but which tucks into a belt is an accepted model and is susceptible of many variations.
Among these Among these is some form of the bolero. A dear little jacket cuts off under the arms to show an un-der blouse, and has trio tabs coming down in front that tuck into the belt. It may fasten across the bust in the bust in jacket style and be trimmed with collar and revers. With a cloth suit the under flounce may be of silk, but is very effectively built of panne velvet, the beautiful Persian designs being especially rich.

A charming idea for a stock is now one of medium height, the style now effected by chic women, made of cloth of gold laid in folds to fit the neck and embroidered with the wearer's favorite flower. A narrow border of velvet cor-fit the neck and embroidered with the wearer's favorite flower. A narrow border of velvet corresponding to the colors employed in the embroidery is used as a finish at the top.

L'Aiglon's popularity is as evident in the floral fashions as in dress. No bouquet of voilets, whether for street or evening wear is considered quite complete unless tied with a Royal purple velvet ribbon tipped with gold spikes, the sort that figures so conspicuously in Rostand's play.

Pinked out frills of taffeta are set crisply as a trimming for cloth gowns of light weights,—and give one the impression of a freshly pluck.

The fashionable outline shows the hats low The fashionable outline shows the hats low and broad, hair not at all remarkable, but soft and full with a slight tendency toward the nape, shoulders broadened, perfectly flat back, waists small, busts well thrown out, and the figure drawn in well below. Hips are small, line of drapery long—flowing. Gloves and shoes easy of fit, willowy poses, gliding movements in walking. Altogether a most pleasing whole.

A feather boa is a most charming adjunct to the toilette and really seems to possess the faculty of making a faded face more youthful and of adding real beauty to a plain face. Harsh outlines are softened, scraggy necks and yellow throats hidden, complexions heightened and an undeniable air of ed, eyes brightened, and an undeniable air of gracefulness added to the ensemble by Various shades of old rose as well as a variety of blue all bordering on the delft shades are much in vogue. You may have all the flounces you want on your new silk dress skirt; in fact they may reach from belt to hem and not be overdone; not for a long season have they been so popular.

The perfectly flat hat of tucked silk is extremely popular and very pretty and girlish. All the clever girls are making their own inserting underneath an inch-wide band to tilt it from the hair, while a few soft rosettes may re-

Cuba is wrestling with the same question that agitates our states-i. e. whether a restricted or an unrestricted suffrage makes for the best results in government.

This is the month that sees the exodus from the cities of the idle and wealthy class who are said "to chase summer." Our southern mounthat the nation should pause a moment on the tains and seaboard are alive with pleasure seekers during the month when our northern climate is most severe.

The peculiar relation that the Supreme Court bears to our government is admired by foreigners and students of government as soon as it is understood. It is unique in the history of governments. By the Constitution, the Supreme Court decides all questions of federal law that involve the expressed or delegated powers of Congress and the implied powers. It is the final tribunal for the interpretation and application of the Constitution and by means of this peculiar power the Supreme Court occupies a throughout the country. Roads are an index position unlike that of any other court of the to this power anew by the recent decision as to the laws of commerce or the tariff duties between the Philippines, Porto Rico and the United States. If these laws were declared our country leads the world in the extent and constitutional it demonstrated the theory that the Constitution followed the flag and that land held by the United States must be considered as territory possessing the inherent power to become states. No decision since the Dred Scot decision has been as far-reaching in its possible results as this present one.

Detroit seems to be having an enjoyable time on the question of standard or sun time. It life such a plan commends itself warmly. The was a surprise to find that any place in the country had not yet adopted the "standard This later demand for material help towards time" put into effect many years ago. This plan divided the United States into four great belts and arranged for an hour's difference in time between each belt. It was universally adopted and simplified railroad time tables and business engagements in general. Detroit is in central time but it still kept the "sun time" so that when Chicago and other cities said 12 M., improvements met with bitter opposition. In Detroit said 12.28. Then the council changed 1808, Gallatin suggested a great system of to standard time. Confusion worse confound- public improvements which were to include a ed ensued. Then the city fathers ordered the system of public roads running from Maine to clocks turned forward again. More confusion! Georgia and thence to New Orleans and San By this time the whole country had aroused to Francisco. Up to 1812 over $200,000 had been exthe fact that whether it was standard time or pended by the United States on the Cumberland sun time there was a "hot time in the old town." There is a celebrated chapter in the Bible that states that there is a time to laugh and a time to weep, and incidentally names a time for most of the duties and pleasures of life but it is silent as to the fixing of time. Detroit can proudly claim that Me and the Sun keep proper time and that the rest of the earth may cling to any old time.

Saint Valentine is the only saint in the calendar whose day is universally recognized. All ages, all colors and all religions bow at some time at his shrine. Religions may change in details but the underlying principle of all that endures in them is love. Good St. Valentine long ago selected February as his month and his day has been faithfully observed ever since. Legends, traditions and folklore have gathered around its observance. The old idea of a valentine called for an original verse from the worshippers at the shrine. What wretched doggerel has been raised to the dignity of the most exquisite verse because it was read through the rose color of the "light that never was on land or sea." The extravagant ways of the age show | freight for short distances. In such a case the

St. Valentine feelings. Verses written on laced paper, with fat hearts and arrows, darts, cupids and true lover's knots belong to the century that is gone. The pictured heart has given place to one of gold, the pictured flowers to violets at four cents apiece. The modern expensive tribute can say no more than the old style valentine. The pessimistic carper may claim that it says less and that true sentiment is outgrown with the old simplicity of expression. St. Valentine is the patron saint of love and when that sentiment ceases to exist human nature and even divine nature will be

February is the birth month of two great Americans—Washington and Lincoln. The question has sometimes been asked, "Who is the greatest American?" The argument has often been advanced that Benjamin Franklin in his three-fold duties of statesman, man of letters and man of science, might properly be considered in an all-around sense as the greatest American. The American people have answered by national and state legislation. They have called Americans young and old to observe the birthday of two men, Washington the creator and Lincoln the preserver of the Union. These men may be considered as the two absolutely indispensable figures in the drama of history. Each brought qualities that were a distinctive part of his own personality, and these qualities were the ones that compelled success. No greater contrast could be found than that presented by the general characteristics, education and environment of the two men. Washington of aristocratic birth, trained in the surroundings and society of the oldest civilization that America could boast and Lincoln, the descendant of the "poor white" element with the crude life of the frontier as a preparation -- no greater contrast could be presented. In the dark and troublous times that each man faced the characteristic that distinguished him among his fellowmen was an infinite patience and an unfaltering faith in the ultimate result of the struggle. It is fitting natal day of these two great men and review the simplicity, sincerity and patience that meant more in the end than all other qualities however brilliant. The lessons to be drawn from the characters of the men themselves is no less vital than an appreciation of the achievements of their lives.

The remarkable development of interest in automobiles promises to revive a forgotten page in our history. Bicycles created a demand for good roads and a most remarkable improvement in this direction has taken place of civilization. Rome maintained her power world. The attention of the people is directed by a remarkable series of roads radiating in all directions from the imperial city so that the phrase "All roads lead to Rome" was an historical truth in the days of the Cæsars. While development of its railroads, it is far behind other nations in its roads. We have hardly learned the art of road making. The Automobile Club has appointed a committee of leading and representative citizens who are to endeavor to influence Congress to build a great national boulevard from Boston to San Francisco. With the development of interest in the bicycle, the automobile and in outdoor railroads spoiled the old interest in good roads. good roads revives interest in the old Cumberland road. In 1806 the United States began the Cumberland road which was to lead from Pittsburg west and to open the public lands of Ohio. Up to this time public improvements had been made by the states alone and the devotion of the public revenue to internal Road. In 1816, Calhoun brought forward a bill authorizing the expenditure of about a million and a half on canals and roads. This bill was vetoed by Madison in the closing days of his administration. In spite of this by 1821 over $1,800,000 had been spent on the Cumberland road and it was slowly being developed westward. Calhoun had come to the view that the appropriation of money for internal improvements was unconstitutional. In 1822, Monroe vetoed a bill for the preservation and repair of the road. After years of struggle, the principle that government money may be spent for such improvements has been accepted by all political parties, but the development of railroads has caused the neglect of wagon roads. If the Automobile Club shall succeed in causing Congress to adopt its old plan and build a great road, the greater portion of the population will be pleased. While such a road would serve at first as a pleasure ground it might aid in developing new schemes of transportation for business purposes. With a fine system of roads the automobile may become an important factor in the transportation of

THE RESIDENCE OF THE PROPERTY OF THE PARTY O

N these days when the bicycle has been utilized for everything under the sun, we are surprised at nothing. The automobile is a combination of the bicycle idea with the use of electricity, so that recent advances made in automobiles comes in our line. As is well known, the question of the use of automobiles in military operations is one which now occupies the mind of all military authorities. To France must be given the credit of having first taken up the matter seriously, and for having brought it within the range of practice. The good work done in the maneuvers was the result of years of experimenting and therefore it was possible to employ several kinds of automobiles, each one well adapted to the use to which it was put.

Military automobiles can be put in one of three classes:

1—For carrying passengers.

2—For the transportation of light material.

3—Traction automobiles for the conveyance of heavy material.

3—Traction automobiles for the conveyance of heavy material.

Those of the first class resemble closely the automobiles used by private individuals. They include Dion Tricycles, which are employed by the general staff for the rapid transmission of orders and dispatches.

These tricycles are painted a dull gray, that being the color most difficult to distinguish at a distance.

with several lengths of wire, which make it possible to operate the projector at some distance from the auto. A table with indicating instruments is stowed in front of the auto.

In London, where every foot of space is very valuable, owners of motor vehicles who "mote" into town to their offices have extreme difficulty in finding suitable stabling places for their rigs, except at enormously high rates.

In some cities they have established a motor vehicle stable, where will be found every requisite for the charging and repairing of automobiles of all types. Among the conveniences there found are storage accommodation for the machines, a completely equipped repair shop, waiting rooms, etc., in fact, everything calculated to popularize the place as well as to make it of practical service.

In these days when the proprietor of almost every bicycle repair shop in the country is experimenting in the direction of the application of power to the modern bicycle, it is customary to class all efforts in a similar direction, even of a decade ago, as "ancient". In this sense, therefore, the following description of one of the earliest steam-driven bicycles ever seen in this country is not without interest, although it made its appearance only 15 years ago—in January, 1885. It was perfected by L. G. Copeland, of Phoenix. Ariz., who gave several very successful exhibitions of its powers.

A reciprocating steam engine is attached to the bar of a Star Bicycle, which connects the steering bar with the small wheel in front. Benzine is used for fuel, and this is carried in a reservoir farther down on the bar. Ninety pounds of steam can be carried, but the machine can be run with 20 pounds. The machine representation of two bolts the entire machine can be taken off, and there remains an ordinary Star Bicycle in its entirety. The boiler, water breeding The of these rabbits is in its infancy in this country. Until very recently little attention has been paid to it in the Eastern States, and though more extensive interest has been displayed in the West there has been scarcely a beginning even there.

New England seems to take the lead in the East, but the demand in New York and Philadelphic is steadily increasing.

East, but the demand in New York and Philadelphia is steadily increasing.

While it is only within the last fifteen years that Belgian hares have been introduced into this country, they have been raised extensively in Europe for half a century.

The exact origin of this breed is very much in doubt, if not entirely unknown. The theory has been advanced that they are the development of a cross between a rabbit and a hare, but this is undoubtedly traditional. It is far more probable that they are the result of a cross between two varieties of rabbits, black and white and red, or black and red, a purely artificial type of rabbits from which years of experimental breeding have stolen their most characteristic points.

They were first introduced into England from characteristic points.

They were first introduced into England from Belgium, France and the Netherlands, as an article of food, and it is estimated that England alone consumes between two and three million dollars worth of Belgian hare meat per annum.

English breeders confine themselves almost entirely to the raising of fancy stock, this line being more profitable, although greater capital is required. Prices range from $10 to $150 per head, according to the pedigrees and points considered and scored upon in the show ring. Some of these are undesir a ble in the food animal, where weight is sought after at the expense of symmetry.

After a visit to one of the firstclass rabbitries, one can readily one can readily understand the rapid growth of interest in this industry, for there is something very attractive, even to the novice, about the general contour and appearance of a thoroughly well-bred Belgian hare.

On entering a well kept rabbitry one is immediately impressed by its absolute cleanliness, for it is most essential that scrupulous care be exercised in this particular. The rabbits are kept in small cages or hutches, the size being about four by five feet and perhaps two and a half feet in height. These are arranged in tiers around the sides, as well as in the center of the room, separated by wooden partitions or wire netting, and each contains but one specimen, except in the case of a doe and her litter, for a well pedigreed Belgian insists on being sole monarch of his domain and resents the entrance of all intruders, the does being particularly autocratic.

One sees the little creatures sitting here in state, gazing complacently out of their large brown eyes, receiving in the most dignified manner the admiration which they never fail manner the admiration which they have to excite, occasionally hopping around their small quarters and taking a nibble at a portion of the pine partitions of the cage, or the remains of a former meal. They are fed twice a day, principally on oats and hay, and require plenty of clear, fresh water. These hares are properly speak-ing, rabbits, and the confusion the confusion has arisen owing to the Belgian words for hare and rabbit being identical. They resemble the English hare in size and shape and are much larger than an larger than an ordinary rabbit, a full grown Belgian weighing from seven to nine pounds Their bodies slender and their sars long and slim. In some of the imported rabbits there is an entire absence of the dewlap, while the best domestic varieties show a moderate development of this feature. Their color is of a soft rich roan or "rufous red," the shade being influenced by the ticking, or black hairs which are irregularly interspersed among the

The litters average about seven. The young are born with closed eyes and without hair. The eyes do not open until the growth of fur is well started; generally about ten days after birth. They are kept housed in New England climate the year round, being susceptible to dampness, though not seriously affected by cold.

cold. So many generations of these animals have So many generations of these animals have been bred in captivity that they have lost the original faculty which their wild ancestors possessed of providing for themselves, and were they now turned adrift, the quantity of green food which they would greedily devour would prove most disastrous to them, and they would succumb also to the vicissitudes of the weather and the changes of climate.

They will stand considerable handling if done in the proper manner, but as they are too heavy to be taken up by the ears alone, the skin immediately back of the ears must be grasped as well.

immediately back of the ears must be grasped as well.

They make most admirable pets, generally gentle and only remonstrating at the familiarity of being touched under the chin, which mark of delicacy we cannot but respect in dealing with these aristocratic little creatures.

Aside from the profit and satisfaction derived from raising Belgians for exhibition and prize winning purposes, there is no doubt that there has been opened to the public a new industry which will prove a source of revenue to those who enter it. In Los Angeles alone last year, eight thousand pounds of Belgian hare meat was marketed. In addition to the meat the fur and skins are of value, the former for hat making and all other purposes for which a cheaper ing and all other purposes for which a cheaper grade of fur is required. The skin is used much more extensively than is generally known n glove making, it being thin, tough, and easily cured.

It must be remembered that all who enter this field in this country now are pioneers; a distinctly American type of Belgians, though desirable, being as yet undeveloped. As the interest grows, there should be no difficulty in disposing of the increase in stock at good prices, a ready market for the young, even of inferior pedigree, being assured. Little space is required, although care and cleanliness are essential. Any place suitable for poultry, if clean and dry, is all that is necessary. The hutches can be easily made and the food is inexpensive. The first cost depends wholly upon the quality of the stock purchased. A trio, consisting of a buck and two does, can be bought for from $25.00 to $100.00. This is the unit, and as the does breed every sixty days, and the young commence to breed very early, a well stocked rabbitry should be the result in a short time. It is necessary, however, to beware of too much inbredling, the same rules applying here as in the rationg of poultry.

Several papers and magazines are now published in the interest of this sport or industry alone, and those who are considering the question can without difficulty become acquainted with all the details requisite for success.

Note by the Editor.

After all it is very questionable if the Belgian It must be remembered that all who enter Note by the Editor.

After all it is very questionable if the Belgian hare industry is not a thing to be deplored. The experience of Australia with rabbits has shown them to be an unqualified curse to the country. Some twenty or thirty years ago a few pet rabbits were taken out by English settlers to the colonies and let loose. Their fecundity is so remarkable that they multiplied in a way that soon caused the farmers to seek government aid to exterminate them. Notwithstanding every effort, and huge rewards offered, they have increased and millions of pounds value in products have been ruined by them.

Already the rabbit nuisance is causing the greatest apprehension in California, where the raising of them was first asserted. They not only destroy the growing vegetable gardens but are particularly fond of the young bark on but are particularly fond of the young bark on small fruit trees and vines. A protest has gone up all over the state against the pest. What is true of California is true everywhere that they have been introduced. Reliable information goes to show that the pleasure of raising them quickly wears out, and that the meat is insipid in taste and does not find a ready market in any section and in most places is practically unsalable.

Recognizing that by careful work in the press the promoters have given this industry wide-spread notoriety, COMFORT has given its readers the above article to show what is claimed by its friends; but we do not endorse the project nor do we advise readers to enter into this scheme, which in the end will cause them disappointment and anxiety. unsalable.

There are many people, both men and women, who shrink from the embarrassment of making their diseases public, and on this account go through the world suffering tortures and pain, but through this method you are able to HEAL YOURSELF IN The PRIVACY OF YOUR OWN HOME, and in a few days you are in the sunshine of health to the surprise of your acquaintances. Many a modest woman suffering untold agony from diseases peculiar to her sex, has gone to a premature grave rather than subject herself to the embarrassment of an examination. The same can be said of men suffering from indiscretions that they were ashamed to confess. This grand method permits sufferers of both sexes to do away with whis embarrassment, for by it they cure themselves without the assistance of anyone, of every disease and infirmity. THE BOOK OF HOPE, written by Prof. Murphy, in a plain and concise manner tells you exactly how you can gain this wonderful influence whereby you become preficient in curing disease and bad habits in yourself and in others; develop mental energy, gratify ambition and your every wish; also gives you the key to personal and social successes and teaches you the GRANDEST AND BEST PAYING PROFESSION OF THE AGE, as it is an acknowledged fact that there is no profession known to-day where independence can be so easily gained as through this grand profession. The football pincushion is made of college colors in silk or wool, as desired. FANCIES.

Mix one-fourth pound almond paste, two and one-half ounces confectioners' sugar and the whites of one and one-half eggs. When well blended add one ounce melted chocolate. Let stand a few minutes, shape in rings, cover with finely chopped pistachio nut meat and bake in a very slow oven.

Bake in a very slow oven.

GLACED FRUITS.

Take the same proportions of sugar and water and boil the liquid until it comes to the crackling point. Test it by dropping a little into cold water. If it is brittle when cooled it is ready for the fruit. Take the kettle from the hot part of the stove, but set it where it will keep warm. Dip candied cherries, grapes, Brazil nuts or whatever nut or fruit you may fancy, into the syrup, and then put them on waxed paper to dry; when quite hard dip them a second time.

OPERA CARAMELS.

fancy, into the syrup, and then put them on waxed paper to dry; when quite hard dip them a second time.

OPERA CARAMELS.

One of the most successful home-made candies is the opera caramel, that somehow takes on a professional air, however it may be handled. Take three cups of granulated sugar and add to it a cup of cream, and a little less than a saltspoonful of cream of tartar. Boil this in a double boiler, and if it has no tendency to grain, it may be easily molded into a soft ball. Then flavor with vanilla or chocolate and str in chopped assorted nuts; when it gets sufficiently cool, roll out and cut into caramels. Grilled pecans are an agreeable sweet to serve at luncheon. Blanch the nuts and to one cup of sugar add one-half cup of water and boil for a few moments. Then drop in the nuts and leave them for about ten minutes. After removing from the fire stir the mixture until the syrup becomes thick and clings to the nuts. Spread to cool on a waxed paper.

Pistachio drops are another toothsome confection. They require one-half pound of nuts, one-half pound of flour, one-quarter pound of butter, one egg, one-quarter pound of confectioners' sugar and one-half teaspoon of baking powder. Rub the butter in the flour, add half of the sugar and all the baking powder, and mix to a stiff paste, using a little cold water and the yolk of the egg. Roll this paste out one-quarter inch in thickness and cut in small squares or oblongs. Next prepare the paste by blanching the nuts and cutting them in not too small pieces, stir in the white of the egg, well beaten, and the remainder of the sugar. Put this paste on the squares and bake in a rather hot oven until browned.

Pistachio balls are made of the blanched nuts, about 1-2 a pound, cut or broken in small pieces, stirred with a syrup made by boiling two cups of sugar with three-fourths of a cup of cold water, until it threads, or can be drawn out in fine bits. The nuts are put in after the syrup is cold: stir the nuts and syrup until it two cups of sugar with three-fourths of a cup of cold water, until it threads, or can be drawn out in fine bits. The nuts are put in after the syrup is cold; stir the nuts and syrup until it creams, a little vanilla being added. Knead this mixture on a marble slab or a large dish as you would bread, then mold into balls, and the confection is ready to serve.

VANILLA CARAMELS.

Two cups of granulated sugar, one cup of rich cream, three-fourths cup of glucose, two teaspoons of vanilla. Glucose is not used for adulteration, but will make them "chewy" as confectioners' caramels are. Put all the ingredients in an enamel saucepan (except the vanilla) over a quick fire, stir constantly to prevent curdling, boil until a little dropped in water will make "hard ball"; it must not be brittle. When cooked to the proper consistency add the flavoring, pour into a buttered pan, having it pour one-half to three-fourths inch in thickness. Leave until cold, then turn out on a marble slab or board, cut in squares with a sharp "buttered" knife. They should not stand where it is at all damp or cool. Wrap in wax paper.

change of position. This new invention is just an ordinary, lightly-built metal bed with a springy wire mattress that, by a touch of the nurse's hand, can be raised or lowered, tipped this way or that, giving the invalid all the delightful sense of movement and change without really altering the position in the least.

Then there is the bed for people with broken limbs or injured backs, who dare not move as they hope to grow well and strong. This delightful bed is fitted with special springs and casters so adjusted that it can be pushed about a room without ever so slightly jarring the occupant, and yet affording a constant variety in location. Even the relief of occupying different rooms from time to time is now possible, which means so much in cheerfulness and strength to invalids. While the pivoted bed has been made especially for those who are forced to a prolonged rest on their backs, there have been many improvements put forth lately in behalf of the invalid, who need suffer no such test of endurance and patience, but can sit up a little, for meals.

You know it used to be the fashion—and the only way we knew, in giving the patient an erect bed with the liberal use of pillows to form a back-rest, else a hard board, with an easel support, was placed behind the sick person, a pillow put on this and the body was propped into just the posture that threw all the strain on the base of the spine. Now an excellent appliance has been brought out that does away with pillows entirely. The new back-rest, for use in bed, is cushioned, built high enough to afford a head supporter, has tuft projecting ears, like the "grammy chair", to cut off draughts, and well-cushioned arms on both sides to give the patient comfort for her elbows. This back-rest is so arranged that the invalid can sit or partially recline at any angle by merely working a small lever at one side, herself, which throws the broad supporting bard backwards as the need may be.

Then, too, for the bed-ridden invalid, who creeps out to the comparative freedo

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

NE who goes only once to a Chinese theater thinks of it as a place of awful noises, gorgeous costumes and a per-formance of which it is impossible for an American to get head or tail.

It was my good fortune not long ago, to be come intimately acquainted with the manager of one of the most perfectly equipped Chinese theaters ever operated in America, and through his kindness and by means of his explanations I came to have a pretty good understanding of how the play-house was run, and a fairly good comprehension of the plot of the play which was the leading attraction at the time.

The company playing at this house had been brought over from China entire. In it were some very distinguished actors in their own country. The entire expense of establishing the company in this country was far into the thousands, and they paid duty on $15,000 worth of costumes alone. I wish I could describe these costumes more fully than I can. Only a feminine eye could do justice to them. They were almost all, even for the men, long, full, flowing robes, and most of them made of beautifully soft silken materials of brilliant colors. Many of the costumes were ornamented with exquisite embroidery in colored silks. If any one color predominated it was red, in various shades; next to that I think green, embroidered with yellow was most worn. A Prince, going to war, wore a belted kilt over loose trousers. The trousers were of soft red silk; the kilt of stiff green brocade embroidered with silver which his silver sword and dagger matched.

silver which his silver sword and dagger matched.

This prince was the hero of the play. When I came to understand the plot I was particularly impressed by the strange similarity between the theme of this heathen drama, perhaps three thousand years old, and the story of the birth and life of Jesus, the founder of the Christian religion. I do not think any one could have studied the play as much as I did and not feel this.

studied the play as much as I did and not feel this.

In China there is no form of piety more reverenced than that which is expressed by filial love and devotion to one's parents. The hero of the play was a young man whose parents in their old age had fallen into such trouble that they were almost starving, and he was not able to get work by which he could support them. To provide for their wants he had himself sold into slavery, to be carried to a far province, the price paid for him insuring his parents a comfortable support so long as they might live. This devotion so pleased the gods that they rewarded him, a slave, by having him win the favor of the ruler of the province, and the latter promoted the young man from one official honor to another, until be becomes, at the death of the ruler a Prince, and himself supreme in the province.

But a still greater honor was to be bestowed upon him. The gods sent from heaven to be his wife a beautiful angel, one of six lovely sisters, and to them a little baby son was afterwards born.

THE GIANT OXIE PILL DEPT. M, Augusta, Maine

Well, dears, did you get fairly started off in the twentieth century? I sincerely hope you did, and that you will have the opportunity of being with it for a long time and getting just as much benefit and pleasure out of it as anybody else gets. Now let us see who comes first in the new year:

From the pile of letters before me the first one I take up is from Cousin Eletse, of Houghton, Mich., and she wants some girls and young men to correspond with her, but I cannot assist her, for as well-meaning as she may be, unknown correspondence is a dangerous thing for a girl, or for anybody for that matter and should not be indulged in.

Sweet Buttercup, Ft Wayne, Ind. Wait for

Sweet Buttercup, Ft. Wayne, Ind.—Wait five years. (2) It is not necessary to ask a caller to call again when he departs, but it is a friendly act. (3) Send your callers home at 10.30. (4) You know well enough it is not proper to sit on your "gentleman friend's lap." Do Ft. Wayne girls do that way? I mean the nice girls. Same about kissing. (5) Do as you please about offering the six o'clock caller refreshments.

The Jolly Four, Marietta, Ohio.—At what age should a girl receive a "fellow." Haven't all the educational institutions of Marietta taught you that? Your other questions would indicate that they had not.

Gray Eyes, Tallapoosa, Ga.—Yes, agirl of sixteen may go home from a party with a boy in case of emergency.

wire emergency.

Viola, Carrington, N. D.—One letter a week ought to be enough from the young man, even though he may have once written two. As they say down South, "Don't crowd the mourners."

Blue Eyes and Brown, Byron, Wis.—There are circumstances under which a girl of fifteen might correspond with a boy friend of the family away at school, but her mother should see all the letters. (2 and 3) Kissing and hand-holding are only for engaged and married people. (4) You must exercise your own judgment in making the young man. a present, but it must be something in expensive and simple. A scarfpin is something a man can always find use for.

sally and Lena, Cameron, Texas.—You are pretty silly, but you ought to break the engagement if he will not give you a ring. Is he old enough to know better? (2) Don't write again until he writes. (3) "Children obey your parents" is a good rule for you. (4) Give the young man up if he doesn't come to see you. What else can you do when he is so indifferent as that?

see you. What else can you do when he is so indifferent as that?

Silvia, Pasadena, Cai.—Lemon juice is excellent to remove freckles; better let moles alone. Consult a physician about the other. (2) Nobody knows what will reduce fat with safety until he knows the case. Ask your physician.

Bonnie Blossom, Mitchell, Ind.—See above for your first three or four questions. The other sixteen are altogether too numerous and diversified for me to answer in one issue of Comfort. Suppose you give them to me on the installment plan.

Annie Laurie, Mt. Zion, Va.—The use of depilatories is dangerous except under a physician's directions. (2) The causes of pimples are so numerous and the cures so diversified that it is best to consult your physician. There are dozens of remedies no one of which would apply to your case.

Just One Girl, McCanna, N. D.—The most effectual remedy for a fourteen year old girl's silliness about men is a slipper and I sincerely hope your mother will not hesitate to apply it often if necessary, and I as sincerely hope that one application will bring you to your senses.

cation will bring you to your senses.

Old Maid, Prineville, Oregon.—I am ordinarily very slow to counsel a girl to go against the wishes of her parents in marrying, but yours is a case in which I do not hesitate to advise you to marry the young man. As you are the only child and evidently a very conscientious and considerate young woman, they will not withhold their blessing very long, if at all, when they see your mind is made up to do what your heart tells you is best.

Brown eyed Nell, Portsmouth, Va.—Talk to the merchants in your town and in Norfolk about your needle-work and also write to merchants in Washington and Baltimore. Or to the Woman's Exchange in any of the places named, if they have them. There is a very successful one in Philadelphia. You might write there and inquire. What you want to do can only be done by constant effort and inquiry.

Mattie King, Roanoke, Ind.—See stamp dealers'

Mattie King, Roanoke, Ind.—See stamp dealers advertisements in Comfort.

Bluebell, Creola, Ala.—If the sixteen year old girl is pretty she should not wear a "face veil." (2) Yes, wear the hair up, if grown. (3) Yes, if he does not object. (4) As a rule a girl should not go riding with a man unless she is chaperoned, but customs differ in country and city. (5) If I could give a recipe for earning pin-money by home work, I could get rich off of it. (6) A sixteen year old girl should break her engagement, whether the young man gives her nice presents or not. She has no business to be engaged at that immature age.

Each one of the above three lines of figures spells the name of a great city in the United States. This is a brand new puzzle and can be solved with a little study, as follows: There are twenty-six letters in the alphabet, and we have used figures in spelling the cities instead of letters. Letter A number 1, B number 2, C number 3, etc., throughout the entire alphabet. IF YOU CAN SPELL OUT THESE THREE CITIES YOU MAY SHARE IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF $1,000 WHICH WE ARE GIVING AWAY for doing a little work for us. This you can do in less than one hour of your time. This and the United States and Canada. WE DO NOT WANT ONE CENT OF YOUR MONEY. When you have made out the names of these three cities, write them plainly on a postal card and send it to us, and you will hear from us promptly BY RETURN MAIL. It may take an entire evening to solve the three copy of this high-class ONE DOLLAR MAGAZINE WILL BE SENT FREE to everyone answer in immediately. In a poke, but did you ever hear a Pig Sing? Well, this Musical Pig right from the Paris Exposition, is the latest and greatest wonder out. More fun with this cute little porker than anything ever invented. You simply blow him up like the picture here then the Pig begins to Sing. After singing awhile he squeals, then collapses, then gives up the ghost with a last faint grunt and finally dies. Everything about the tragseeking for the beautiful; but to me it was very interesting and unique. The streets present a barren aspect and the fruit stands beneath duck canopies are perfectly ludicrous; the stock being only the refuse from El Paso.

"The most attractive building is the ancient Guadaloupe Cathedral, a monument to the piety of the very early inhabitants. Just before the entrance is the public Plaza, a beautiful park containing numerous plashing fountains, beautiful trees, smooth green sward and lovely flowers. Near the center is a monument of a Mexican hero. Passing into the interior of the church, I was overcome with a feeling of awe as though really in Divine presence. The high walls are stained and the ceiling is arched and frescoed. The thorncrowned, loving Christ looks down from several frames on the walls, and there, too, is the faithful Mary. The altar is positively dazzling in its brilliancy and beauty.

"Second in interest—first with many—ranks the amphitheater, the scene of the famous bull fights. This is a huge, though rude wooden structure

"Altogether, with her quaint houses, her fine Custom House, her euriosity shops, where there is a bewildering display of lovely drawn work, Juarez possesses a fascination never met with elsewhere."

Annabel Tolbert.

Our next letter is a description of a mint farm in Michigan. As I have never seen such a place the description is of great interest to me and I think it will be to many of my readers.

will be to many of my readers.

"Some years ago I lived on a peppermint farm, and one of the stills was situated but a few rods east of our house. This mint farm, which is about twelve miles east of Muskegon, contains about seven hundred acres of tillable land, and at one time was a great marsh, dotted with clumps of willows, bayberry shrubs, etc. It was also the home of numerous bears. When my people first moved there we found it to be a low, level piece of land, composed of black, rich muck, and crossed by great ditches, from which smaller ones branched in such a way as to perfectly drain the soil.

"The mint, which is grown from the roots, is planted in shallow trenches about three feet apart. A man carries a sack full of these roots on his back, and as he follows the trench, carefully lays the long pink roots into it, while with his feet he shoves the loose soil over them from each side. The dark-green herbage that soon shoots from the soft ground is cultivated much the same as is corn, and is carefully hoed with tiny hoes, and is also weeded by the hands. This herbage, which finally grows into leafy stalks about eighteen inches long, is the first year cut with the common scythe; afterwards with the mowing machine. It is allowed to cure but a short time after cutting, when it is taken to the still.

"The process of distillation is very interesting. The mint is placed on an elevated platform but a short time after cutting, when it is taken to the still.

"The process of distillation is very interesting. The mint is placed on an elevated platform which has a roof but open sides. At the opposite side of the platform are two wooden tubs about eight feet wide, and of the same depth. Into these tubs the mint is pitched with forks, and when full they are closed with air-tight lids. Opposite, and close to the tubs, is a boiler in which steam is generated. It is generally protected by a shed. When all is ready a valve is opened, and the closely confined steam forces its way through a tube into one of the tubs. After the mint is thoroughly steamed the tube leading from the boiler is closed, and another, leading from the tub, is opened. Through this avenue of escape the hot, mint-laden steam passes downward through many lengths of tin tubing over which cold water is constantly falling from at ank above. Each length of tubing is a little lower than the preceding one, and finally the last length opens at one end above a receiver. The steam, cooled until it is a liquid, passes into the receiver, the oil gathering on top, and the water passes from a spout leading from the bottom of the receiver. After the steam has all left the tub, the lid is lifted and the refuse removed. Then while the other tub is being steamed, the first one is again filled. Thus by alternation the tubs are filled and steamed. When oil enough has gathered on top of the water in the receiver, it is dipped off with a cup."

WE GIVE THIS WATCH FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith it is watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guaranter just as binding as that given with any watch, no matter what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you and chain. Address

Then there comes a revolution in the distant part of the province, and the Prince is obliged to buckle on his silver brocade armor and go to part of the province, and the Prince is obliged to buckle on his silver brocade armor and go to war. While he is gone the five heavenly sisters, who have been represented to be desolate in heaven at the loss of one of their number, come down to earth to pay her a visit. This visit takes place on the stage. After the first surprise of the wife and mother is over they sit around in a semicircle, gorgeous to behold, and a lively dialogue takes place which sounds very much like pounding on a big upturned brass kettle with a hardwood stick. The celestial visitors are urging the wife of the Prince to go back with them to her former home. She protests that she cannot bear to leave her husband, and tells them how desolate he will be. They tell her that he will have their little baby son to comfort him, and the baby, represented by a large wooden doll swathed in resplendent clothes is passed about to be admired. The sisters finally prevail, and all six retire from the stage.

There is no curtain. The actors walk on the stage and off when the action calls for their appearance and disappearance. The orchestra, composed of three players, of which I will say more later, sit at the back of the stage, in a little alcove, and play constantly. Supers walk on and off unconcernedly, in the full sight of the audience, to bring on and arrange such simple properties as the Chinese ileas of scenery demand. Some tables and a few chairs are about all, but these are used for many and various properties as the Chinese ideas of scenery demand. Some tables and a few chairs are about all, but these are used for many and various purposes, as will be seen. Interested friends of the actors who are not "on" in any particular act watch the play from the wings in full view of the house.

When the Prince returns from the war he finds himself a widower. At first he is wholly disconsolate, and raves upon the stage in true tragic style, the orchestra meanwhile playing tragic style, the orchestra meanwhile playing in a more awfully minor key than usual. He does not know that his wife has gone back to does not know that his wife has gone back to heaven, nor, in fact, did he know up to that time that she had been heaven-sent to him. While he is lamenting in the middle of the front of the stage, the supers bring in three large tables and place them back of him, in front of the orchestra. The tables are set end to end, and at one end of the line a chair is set which makes a convenient step from the floor to the top of the tables. When this stage arrangement is completed the six sisters make their appearance and by means of the chair walk up on the tables, where they stand in a row with the wife of the prince in the middle. The Prince stops his lamenting, probably for lack of breath, and the wife begins to warble—"wobble" would better express the operation—a message to him, from heaven,

Can you arrange these six different groups of letters into the names of six (6) of the months of the year? If so you can share in the distribution of the above. represented by the elevated position in which the six women stand. These "women" by the way, are all men dressed in skirts, as the tradi-tions of the Chinese stage do not approve of women taking part in plays, although during late years there has been a disposition to change this rule.

The bit of action where the Prince comes to understand the situation is the best exhibition of acting in the whole play. The wife, up in heaven—on the table—warbles a solo softly, as if at a great distance. The bereaved husband hears the sounds faintly, at first, as he indicates by putting one hand to his ear, and standing in a listening attitude. As the angelic song sounds louder, and explains the situation to him, an expression of wonder comes over his face, and then, as she tells of her regret at leaving him, but her belief that the baby will be his comfort, and he begins to realize the honor that has been conferred upon him, the hero's grief gives place to a subdued joy and gratitude that he has been permitted to enjoy even so much of the society of so exalted a personage. He calls a servant and has the baby brought into the room, and takes it in his arms and kisses it. The angel mother looking down from the table sings her joy at the sight, the sisters join in a jubilant chorus, at the end of which they climb down from the tables and walk off the stage. The supers come in and remove the tables and chair, the prince walks off with the baby, and the play is done.

Many Chinese plays go on from day to day in a continued performance of a long drama, but in this case the complete play was given every afternoon and night. Into this performance, too, were introduced certain variety features, similar to our own theatrical methods. There was a sword contest between two soldiers, and a feast was given by the Prince to some noble guest, in order to afford an opportunity for some fancy dancing after the Chinese fashions. Among the dancers was one star performer who was advertised to be one of the famous "small feet." Chinese women. She wore the most wonderful costumes of any of the members of the company, and minced about the stage in a funny little "walk-around," with a great flourishing of a superb fan. As a mat and as they peeped from the hem of his skirt looked like what I should imagine the real thing might.

The three men in the orchestra played on a variety of instruments, according to the sentiment which the action of the play required. I do not know the names of any of the instruments. They were all queer looking; wooden drums, and things which looked like gourds; buckets with strings stretched across them, and a strange fiddle with only one string, on which a man fiddled for half an hour at a time, with his eyes shut. The orchestra smoked cigarettes when they wanted to, and I suspect there was opium in the smoke, for the players seemed in a half somnolent condition a good share of the time. This may have been due to their own music. Awful as it seemed at first I really came to rather like the monotonous "tum-tum" of it. Certainly no other theatrical performance ever gave me more real pleasure than did this in the Chinese play house.

What can be more appropriate for a wedding or birth-

What can be more appropriate for a wedding or birthday present than an Organ or Plano? There was a time when these things were an expensive luxury. Now, however, owing to the change in business methods they are within the reach of all. If any of our readers are in doubt in regard to this let them write to the Beethoven Plano & Organ Company, Box 1624, Washington, N. J., for their large free catalogue. It shows you Organs and Planos that can be purchased from $21.75 upwards and you don't have to pay a cent until you have tried the instrument 30 days. The reason they can sell so cheap is because they are manufacturers and sell direct to the people at a very small profit over the cost to manufacture. Write them to-day.

"LA CRIPPE"

A Real Death Dealing Tidal Wave Sweeps the Country, 150,000 Cases in New York City Alone.

An epidemic of Grip is sweeping the land with cyclonic fury. Death stalks in city and country, touching with its cold, merciless finger high and low, rich and poor.

Ten thousand school children were prostrated by it in Philadelphia in four days, and the last of the holidays saw the city of New York fighting tooth and nail to stay its progress. Men, women and children were dying by the hundreds.

women and children were dying by the hundreds.

Dr. George F. Shrady, the physician and surgeon who attended General Ulysses S. Grant during his last sickness, and whose exquisite skill prolonged the life of the martyr president, James A. Garfield, believes Grip to be one of the most dangerous of diseases. Its worst and most to be dreaded complication is pneumonia. This epidemic gives no warning but steals upon us like a deadly foe and woe be unto the unfortunate person who is a little run down and ailing. It is hard enough for the breadwinners of the family to be laid up three or four weeks without rolling up a big doctor's bill. No one can afford this sickness and unless properly treated there is always a feeling that the strength is gone and good for nothing. Ia Grippe has baffled the skill of doctors, the art of professors and the knowledge of the scientists for years and it remains for the OXIEN Remedies alone to become famous. They are the only true specific and treatment for this unwelcome epidemic germ and for the prevention of Pneumonia and Consumption.

How to fell When You Have the Grip.

You first notice a shivery, creepy feeling all over the body. This is the Grip poison entering the nervous system. Then comes that tired, all-used-up feeling, dullness in head, pain in back of neck and between shoulders, general aching in body, soreness of muscles, limbs heavy, difficulty of breathing, filling up sensation in throat, short quick cough, thin, watery discharge from nose, frequent sneezing and running of eyes. These are the general symptoms, but there are many others all of which denote poisons of the Grip lurking in the system. Without proper treatment you are in an excellent condition for the undertaker. Grip makes people insane; it drives thousands to suicide and to the mad house; it is a plague that makes all who know of its misery-making power shudder.

Women are far more susceptible to the Grip than men. They respond more readily to infection and they are more liable too, to the dread "melancholia" that follows the Grip. Women suffer severely from the sudden shock Grip causes and sink quickly into a state of prostration.

The Grip germ is no respecter of persons.

The Grip germ is no respecter of persons. Rich and poor are all the same and it multiplies so fast that once it enters a community it begins to count its victims not by ones, but by half-dozens and scores.

half-dozens and scores.

OXIEN not only cures but prevents the Grip. Any one fortified by a box of the OXIEN tablets can go with impunity right into a Grip-infested district.

One of the passing questions everywhere now is, What shall we do to ward off the Grip?

That question is answered in the five letters composing the word OXIEN.

OXIEN will cure and OXIEN, taken in connection with nourishing liquids and fortified by OXIEN Plasters, will help build up those whom Grip has wasted.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE Sun "crosses the line" this year at about 15 minutes past 2 o'clock in the morning of the 21st day of March, Washington Time, and at that moment a new Astrological year begins. A figure of the heavens erected for that moment shows the 5th degree of Scorpio on the midheaven and the first decanate of the sign Capricorn on the Ascendant or eastern horizon. Both Jupiter and Saturn are on the Ascendant just about to appear above the horizon; the Sun is near the 3rd cusp; the Moon in the 3rd house nearly in square with the rising planets; Mars is in the 8th house; Herschel is on the 12th cusp, and Mercury and Venus are in the 2nd house.

The great benefic Jupiter still favors the Nation and continues his promise of increased advantages and prosperity to the people of the country. Saturn on the Ascendant, in square with the Moon indicates some unusual hardships to the farming community in the north-eastern regions, resulting from the poor yield of certain crops in 1900 and hence their diminished revenue. The Moon in the 3rd, afflicted, points to some sudden deaths from accidents on railroads and the increased prevalence of digestive disorders affecting the head and brain, and will be likely to result in more than usual deaths from apoplexy, paralysis and heart trouble. Mars in the 8th indicates increased mortality among the soldiers in our extreme southwestern possessions. There will be also an increase of mortality from diseases of the heart. Herschel on the 12th points to public scandal over prison management in some section or some extraordinary prison-breaking.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR MARCH, 1901.

MARCH. 1—Friday. Seek no promotion in official ations nor any favor from thine employer; deal not in attents or patented goods and avoid business communitions with large corporations.

2—Saturday. Improve the afternoon hours in preference to those in the earlier parts of the day for transaction of all general business, when also dealings with government officials and superintendents of great public works will be favored, and business with such persons will be more than usually successful.

3.—Sunday. Not specially favorable as a Sabbath day and church finances are not likely to be much improved; the evening is mischievous and threatens discord in the social relations and between those matrimonially inclined; keep the temper and avoid rashness in all transactions.

4-Monday. Pursue vigorously all avocations except those which pertain to the elegant in life; ask money accommodations, buy all but fancy goods for trade and deal with judges, ecclesiastics and the wealthy; the past 24 hours have been more than ordinarily mischievous for persons born about the 19th of February, IIst of May, 23rd of August, and 22nd of November, of past years, especially for those active in social life, or whose minds are turned in the direction of matrimony. Such persons will be wise to avoid temptation towards gratifications of a character not commendable.

5—Tuesday. Have no important dealings with lawyers, booksellers and all engaged in the scientific and literary pursuits; postpone important correspondence and do not make any beginning in any matter of consequences.

6—Wednesday. A very favorable day for the vigorous prosecution of business, although the late hours caution against too free expenditure of means for gratifications, as extravagance will be invited and waste will

7-Thursday. Beware of entering into any bargain concerning houses or lands on this day; sign no contracts, loan not thy credit nor enter into any litigation; look out not to be induced to buy patented articles and beware of soliciting favor at the hands of municipal authorities.

S-Friday. Give preference to this day for transaction of business with dealers in hardware, cutlery, fire-arms, metals, glassware, brass and iron work and chemical and electrical apparatus and also with all persons engaged in the ingenious and mechanical trades; trade with manufacturers, engineers, firemen, carpenters, cattle-dealers, bakers, barbers, tailors and chemists.

S-Saturday. A very fortunate day for money dealings and the prosecution of all general business and for the purchasing of goods for trade especially such as pertain to the ornamental or decorative in life; all art enterprises on this day are likely to yield unusual advantages and profits.

10—Sunday. This day conduces to happy efforts of the clergy, giving special eloquence and zeal to the ex-temporaneous speaker and closer attention and more ready comprehension from the listener.

11-Monday. Be not rash in the morning, nor let thy temper overcome good judgment in the noon hours; do not speculate nor concern thyself with real estate mat-

12.—Tuesday. Avoid litigation; use the pen very cautiously, engage in no important transactions with printers, booksellers, stationers, mathematicians, lawyers or public writers and do not travel unnecessarily; ask no favors from persons in government service or employ; do not engage with corporations nor take the day for erecting any corporate body; architectural work, especially on public buildings, is not likely to be successful or profitable.

13—Wednesday. Do not ask favor or promotion from persons in authority; beware of the contraction of severe and dangerous colds involving the lungs; the day is not to be depended on for the inauguration of any important matter.

14—Thursday. Bright and prosperous are the conditions of this day for travellers, merchants, tradesmen, and speculators; applications for favor from persons of promineace or distinction will meet with more than ordinary success; the day is particularly fortunate for changing residence, for dealings with persons engaged in the literary pursuits and those connected with the polite arts; have transactions with printers, booksellers, stationers, mathematicians, officers of state and all ingenious persons. Reculus particularly commends this day to his friends and urges its fullest employment for the greater undertakings in life, especially in connection with the literary world.

15—Friday. Be in no haste to use the morning hours for beginnings, but as the forenoon advances let every energy be put forth and all honorable business pushed to the utmost; the forenoon is best avoided for the transactions concerned with real estate and mines.

16 Saturday. A favorable day for the vigorous prosecution of business although the morning hours present some thwarting testimonies and forbid dealings with persons who are very eccentric or much advanced in years.

17—Sumday. A day of intellectual acuteness though tendencies to sarcasm and bitterness of speech are incited; strange whims and notions become pronounced and the temper will need healthful check; let all in charge of church buildings have unusual care for avoidance of fires; let all persons born about the 13th of February, 18th of May, 19th of August, or 18th of November, of past years, have unusual care in these passing days for avoidance of fires and explosions, and to keep out of ittigation or contention. There will be some unusual fire losses in these days. All should be careful in handling inflammables and explosives.

ing any new and important work or for launching any of their productions in the literary world.

19—Tuesday. Give preference to the forencon for money dealings pertaining to houses and lands; do not deal with any corporation in the noon hours; the afternoon is more favorable than usual for the artist and musician; the elegant occupations will be specially prosperous; deal in fancy goods and articles of dress or adornment. More than ordinary pleasure may be had from the social, musical, or dramatical entertainments in the evening.

Wednesday. An indifferent day, giving but promise of advantage or profit from undertakings begun; they are best postponed for a short season.

now begun; they are best postponed for a short season. 21-Thursday. Be careful of the purse in the forenoon, when thou shouldst not have any dealings in land or mining properties of any description; choose the latter half of the day for dealings with surgeons, military men, cutters, chemists and those generally in the mechanical callings; the mechanic and manufacturer are peculiarly favored.

22-Friday. The forenoon is the least favorable part of the day, but after the noon hour, urge all manner of traffic; do important correspondence, sign deeds and writings, hire servants and engage actively in the literary pursuits, even late into the night.

23—Saturday. Urge business to the utmost during every moment of this day; choose it for all scientific and literary pursuits, music, painting and illustrating literary productions; make contracts in commerce and in all artistic speculations; buy goods to sell again, especially such as are used for building and improving real estate and mining property.

24 Sunday. The day in general is a peculiarly good one though the morning and forenoon hours are less to be depended upon for good, as conditions interfere with domestic tranquility and contribute to strife and disruption in both the social and more tender relations.

disruption in both the social and more tender relations. 25—Monday. Merchants should transact business cautiously during the early forencon when also those employed with the pen must act with more than ordinary circumspection; purchases for trade are best deferred until the afternoon hours, when also money accommodations are more readily obtained; give preference to the afternoon for dealings with cutlers, cattle-traders and mechanics.

26—Tuesday. Continue thine efforts of yesterday throughout this day, giving preference to the forenoon for transactions with dentists, surgeons, druggists, chemists, machinsts and all workers with fire and metals; make engagements with manufacturers and crowd all general business except that pertaining to the fine arts and the beautiful in life.

27—Wednesday. The very early hours of this day are the best, when the merchant, tradesman, commercial traveler and all engaged in literary pursuits or having employment concerning books are particularly favored; as the forenoon advances the day is less auspicious; money matters are embarrassed and speculations now engaged in will result in loss; the forenoon should be used for routine matters only; transactions pertaining to lands, buildings, or agriculture should not be entered into at this time.

28—Thursday. This day is recommended for the artist, dramatist, and musician and the elegant occupations will be specially prosperous; deal in fancy goods and articles of dress or adornment; sign no writings of consequence in the noon hours.

Equence in the noon hours.
Friday. Use this day for advancing thy busi-without preference for any in particular.

30—Saturday. Bend every energy to the prosecution of business in the first two-thirds of this day, when also public officials and officers of large corporations will be pleasantly disposed; put on the "cautious cap" in the afternoon, avoiding rashness and controversy in all matters.

31-Sunday. A fortunate Sabbath day though not conducive to harmony in associations with very aged persons, who are best avoided.

PROF. JULES LABORDE, NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

For years the cry has gone up from hundreds and thousands of men, young and old, for a remedy that would rid them of the terrible result of early follies or excesses, or of the overwork and worry that say the physical vitality.

The medical profession of this country seemed powerless to cope with the appalling and disastrous diseases and annoying weaknesses of men resulting from violation of Nature's laws.

PROF. LABORDE'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

PROF. LABURDE'S WUNDERFUL DISCOVERY.

It remained for the eminent French authority, Prof. Jules Laborde, to conduct scientific inquiry into the cause and cure of Lost Vitality, Sexual Weakness, Spermatorrhoa, Epilepsy, Impotency, Small Parts, and the world today acknowledges the supremacy of the wonderful remedy "CALTHOS."

The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio,

70.000 PRICES 17,000 PICTURES 1,200 PAGES

This book tells pretty nearly what your dealer pays for everything. It quotes wholesale prices on 70,000 articles, and shows pictures of 17,000 of them. It includes practically everything that anybody uses, wears or eats; and its prices are the lowest ever quoted. It will save the average family at least $100 a year --- some $500. Two million people send for this book yearly as a buying guide, and we want you to have one, too.

For 29 Years we have been selling merchandise by mail at about what smaller dealers pay. Ours is the original catalogue business and the greatest mail order house in the world. This enormous business has been gained and held by underselling everybody, by treating customers fairly, and by doing as we agree. We keep the customers we secure.

Two Million People are now numbered among our customers. We carry for them a stock valued at $2,500,000. We employ 2,000 clerks to fill their orders and 100 typewriters to write letters to them.

You Need This Book because you can rely on it. Other catalogues are offered you, but this one is best. Our house is the oldest and largest, and our prices are always the lowest. Our guarantee is the fairest. And our record of a quarter century assures you of fair dealing.

We Guarantee Satisfaction and safe delivery. Every article in our catalogue is described exactly as it is. Not the slightest exaggeration is ever permitted. But if anything that you get doesn't suit you in quality, or price, or fit, send it back and we will replace it. Or we will send your money back, and pay transportation both ways. We consider no expense or effort too great to avoid having one dissatisfied customer.

Two Thousand Stores in One

Two thousand average dealers together will not buy so much in a year as we. The makers who sell to us have no traveling expense, no credit risk, no losses, no salesmen to pay. They save the whole cost of selling the same goods to 2,000 separate stores, scattered everywhere. The fiercest competition in America centers in the effort to get our trade. The prices we pay are never much above cost; and goods that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. Is it any wonder that we can sell for about what common dealers pay?

We get along with a fraction of the profit charged by stores. We have no salesmen—no selling expense save our catalogue. A dealer must make several times as much on each article to make expenses and live. Our expense is but a small percentage, on sales that amount to millions of dollars annually.

We simply combine the buying and selling of two thousand average stores. We save the wasteful methods that cost more than the merchandise, and we give the saving This is the modern method of business, and the buying of the 20th century will be done more and more by In this way we are now saving our customers from four to five million dollars annually. You will become one of those customers when you see this book.

The Claim Jumper at Pioneer Camp.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY OSCAR S. SEAVER.

Copyright, 1901, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

T was in the late "fifties."

Ben Roarer, who had risen to the state of single handed miner through the stages of "broken down miner," "buil puncher," "prospector," and finally 'claim jumper," had for two years worked a claim of clouded title to such good profit that high life at Pioneer Camp was wont to know much of him one month and none of him for an equal time thereafter. The claim accountable for the month of luxury, as wild cat gold camps of the Rockies knew it.

was as surely accountable for the miner's subsequent disappearance. Good and bad times, which depended mostly on "clean ups," had the effect, naturally, to extend or to abbreviate the month of Ben's sojourn to his claim; and upon occasion that period of time nearly doubled or only half transpired before his return. But it was upon the last trip he even made that his return followed closest; then it was unmistakably premature and precipitate.

Out from camp the stubborn twisting trail offered no serious difficulty until Pioneer Camp and anything pertaining to high life had been left a half day's journey behind. Then it took to hugging a rugged precipice so closely as to give but scant foothold between the rocky wall and a chasm of dizzying depths. Here the miner was accustomed to leave his shaggy pony to shift for himself until Pioneer Camp should again be in order, and proceed the rest of the way on foot. But custom was a matter of necessity, for generally-and particularly upon his last trip-Ben Roarer would have far rather trusted the ticklish path to his pony's head than his own, from which it is to be drawn that Ben Roarer, who was a giant and a ruffian, was also at moments—for which the high life at Pioneer Camp may or may not have been responsible-something of a coward.

Fortunately it was not a long trail of nerve, and at the end the trail wound down through the hemlocks and ended in a lap of the hills where the coveted claim was located.

On his last trip, Ben took to the path with all the mountaineer's instinct of caution. Balancing his month's bag of flour and snack of bacon on a stick over his shoulder and leaning his weight against the rocks, he grasped the available roots and rocky points for his surer support. Half-way across a spring oozed from a cleft in the rock, and here the miner stopped and took a long refreshing draught.

"God is good," was his solitary comment of satisfaction. Then he started on again but he went a very little way when he uttered a cry and stopped affrighted in his tracks.

Ben Roarer had come in sight of his claim, old trick.

and there beside the tilting box he saw an active little old man unmistakably at work. Ben The astute ruffian had never failed in passing dropped to a sitting posture on the narrow path and let his legs dangle over the edge.

"Good Lord!" he ejaculated, brushing his horny hand across his perspiring brow. It was a habit of Ben's which he felt redeeming to hook the expression of his feelings with the personality of his Maker. Yet on its own account the sight was enough to try the miner's powers of ejaculation to the utmost.

It was not a case of simple claim jumping, for that would have been a proposition of dog eat dog quickly settled by a crafty crawl and a pot shot. The man was not a stranger. The flabby black sauce-pan hat had a familiar tilt; the clothes too, were clearly reminiscent; and by all Ben's lights of observation and judgment the features were those of Jim Rawlson, whom he had shot two years previous in a dispute not only concerning, but upon the premises of that very claim to which he was now returning. Ben neither pronounced it an illusion nor commented upon the quality of spirits sold at Pioneer Camp. What he did was to crawl back to the spring and soberly immerse his head in the cool, sparkling pool before taking a second observation.

Still it was an uncanny sight. He could swear to the man's identity. Beard a trifle grayer to be sure, and the general cut a little more broken down than formerly; but all that was to be expected after being shot and dropped over the edge of the canyon like so much carrion. Ben was scared. He felt the helplessness of being in the presence of the supernatural. Added to the scare was the sickening sense of how ineffective a lead slug would be upon an apparition. But he failed to reason that the weapon hanging naturally upon the hip of the worker would be quite as ineffective upon him.

Therefore, Ben Roarer, claim jumper number one, made no demonstration against the eerie worker, but continued to sit with his back against the rock wall and his legs hanging over the abyss, turning matters in his mind. That he had wrested the claim wrongfully from Rawlson there was no controverting. In fact, he had shot and killed him. But that had been easily smoothed over by his own affidavit of self defense and prior ownership which he knew to be untrue, and the unpopularity of his victim at Pioneer Camp, where sentiment was the sole adjudicator. A clear case of "ciaim jumping!" But now here was the victim back again as spry as ever, and undoubtedly ready to file an affidavit of a contradictory nature, which under the leery circumstances would be indisputable. At this point in his meditations and several others of like portent, Ben Roarer was in danger of sliding limply over the edge of the trail and into the canyon.

Reason as he might, no agreeable dawning broke to Ben's befogged mind. Frequent peekings taken stealthily did not destroy the identity of the little gray bearded man who all the while worked smartly. The incessant action of the man's jaws even disclosed a new mark of identification. Yet despite this and the more substantial argument of a new heap of pay dirt, which only weeks of labor could create, claim jumper number one had a lingering hope that it was all an illusion which would pass as equally harrowing illusions had passed before.

So when the sun beat directly downwards and the solitary worker drew off for his noon meal. Ben crawled stealthily down to the outskirts of the claim. From one corner to another he stole and in turn scanned the trees upon which he had tacked his notices of location. His were not there! Others hardly mildewed occupied their places, and all bore another's name. If he had studied them more closely or had the penmanship of the new claimant been more legible, matters would have appeared in a different light. But it was not to be, for it was sufficient that the name which stared him in the face was "Rawlson!"

Ben slunk off into cover. Seated at the foot of a hemlock, he intended to grapple with this conclusive bit of evidence. But he had hardly begun in earnest when he was startled by a voice at his shoulder.

"Move a hair uv yer head and I'll send yer ter hell!" came the stern, snappy admonition of anything but a dead man. Ben looked up terrified and met the piercing gray eyes of a gray bearded little man. They were glassy, he recollected, when he last saw them. But he also met the cold gaze of a Colt's revolver.

"Good Lord, don't!" moaned Ben, as he felt the hair, over which he had no control, rising stiffly beneath his bat.

The little man chewed. Holding that operation in higher esteem than words, he merely surveyed his quarry contemptuously.

"Rawlson?" at last ventured Ben fearfully. "You bet," was the short reply. "Knew me did ver?" he added.

There was surprise evinced in the question but Ben only noted the sarcastic curl of the "Then," continued the little man, "Yer know who yer got ter deal with."

Half sitting, half lying limply at the foot of the tree, Ben realized the worst. Superstition mingled with reality rushed through his mind. Among the wild thoughts he seized one; an "Will yer have my gun?" he asked craftily. his revolver with muzzle pointed toward himself to twirl it like a flash to the end of summarily turning the tables in his favor. He waited eagerly for the answer.

"Got it" replied the little man dryly, chewing in contemplation of an end to the situation.

Ben Roarer's hand went to his hip to find an empty belt, and his jaw fell in awful fear. How he had been robbed of his weapon while wide awake, was too uncanny a matter for him to explain. His intended victim surveyed him coldly, and in that cruel gaze Ben saw no inkling of mercy. His nerves were fast unravelling.

"What do yer want uv me?" he asked in a broken whisper.

"That's my proposition" came the snappy reply. "Calate I'd better drill yer onery hide and let yer go inter ther canyon" he added accommodatingly.

"Good Lord, don't," moaned the nerveless Ben, "lemme go."

Ben's small tormentor twirled his unkempt beard speculatively.

"Go whar?" he finally asked.

"Whar?" cried the big man, "Any whars outen ther country," he added desperately.

"Waal," drawled the other, as though he hated to do it, "Waal, git out then, an' if ever I sot eyes on yer carkiss, I'll shoot yer.'

Ben Roarer needed no urging. Leaving both flour and bacon he tore frantically away lest a change of opinion in the gray bearded little man should drop him unceremoniously in his

The new claimant, claim jumper number two, returned to his solitary toil with contorted face, emitting hoarse, chuckles. But he was not content to let Ben Roarer out of his sight unless it was to hit the trail for other parts. The peaceful manner in which the claim had been surrendered was suspicious, and the man's apparent fright a possible subterfuge.

It was then, for the investigation of these matters, that the little man of the flabby black hat appeared in Pioneer Camp a half day after the fleeing Ben. But the fleeing Ben, to the later sorrow of the little man, had not stopped for more than a graphic but somewhat distorted account of the return to earth of Jim Rawlson, two years dead.

No wonder then the miners, who had laughed at Ben, now stood aside as the apparition walked smartly into the house of recreation! No wonder, too, that the proprietor handed out a tin cup of spirits a little charily, and only after the cup had been emptied in an unmistakably human and commonplace way ventured to speak!

"Rawlson, howdy," he said extending his hand.

The little man turned sharply at the name. "Howdy" he returned. "Yer all seem ter know me hereabouts," he added, puzzled.

"Know yer! of course we know yer," exclaimed the proprietor. "Can't be helped pardner, but I never seed you afore," returned the other.

A gaping circle of red shirted spectators had no help for their misguided spokesman. "Aint you Rawlson that Ben Roarer shot?"

queried the proprietor hastily. "No I aint: at least not yet," replied the little man, sharply scanning the crowd for a possible Ben Roarer.

"You aint Jim Rawlson thet Ben Roarer shot?" persisted the proprietor with scrupulous enunciation.

The little man started at the lesser name. 'No,I aint," he again replied.

"I aint a doubting no man's word, least of all yourn," continued the unconvinced proprietor, 'but I swear yer look jist like him.'

"Orter, I cal'ate" returned the little man less pugnaciously but chewing flercely, "being Jim's own twin brother."

When the grim joke had fairly dawned upon them the miners grew loquacious, and claim jumper number two soon learned the fate of Jim Rawlson and the identity of Ben Roarer. "Whar is Ben Roarer?" he demanded savage-

Jim Rawlson's twin brother bit his lip and dented his tin drinking cup.

"Fer whar?" he asked portentously, preparing to depart.

But here the representatives of high life at Pioneer Camp made a stand; and by way of a benefit for the dispossessed Ben Roarer, they did not betray him.

T is a humiliating thing to confess that one has married a crank, but Mrs. Wellington Wade was going through that enlightening experience. In the days of incipient courtship the idiosyncrasies of her lover appeared to her only as a distinct trait, a marked individuality that separated him from the common herd. adou I tell the truth, the whole house was littered with trumpery, and the luckless visitor who made his appearance at the door was immediately submitted to a long explanatory discourse on the contents of the glass cases. Consequently, their old friends had gradually slipped away and Mrs. Wellington Wade found herself the sole auditor of her eager archeologist.

Her services were also brought into requisition as an amanuensis, in preparing a catalogue, which was an exceedingly bulky manuscript and necessitated weary hours of plodding through the historical journals and art manuals. Not content with this sacrifice of his wife's time, the absent-minded collector insisted upon her daily attendance at every auction sale, where she inwardly fumed at the fabulous sums expended in the purchase of insignificant articles, guaranteed to date from the middle ages or before the flood.

Most disheartening of all, she had a vague idea that this dominant desire of her husband had drawn him into the vortex of delusion, that he had become the innocent dupe of unscrupulous sharpers in the shape of suave picture-dealers and shop-tenders who were palming off worthless, modern bric-a-brac for priceless antiques.

This morning they were to attend a sale of oil paintings, where it was rumored a genuine Greuze was the drawing card. Patiently she followed her husband in his tour of the rooms. gazing with helpless ignorance at the array of smoke-dried pictures in their tarnished frames. She could not detect the salient points of the masterpiece, nor was she quite assured that her companion rejoiced in a certain confidence, although he seemed to be studying these exponents of immortal genius with the semblance of a devotee, standing at a respectful distance and holding his hand, after the manner of art critics, slightly curved over his eyes Suddenly he stopped and bent toward her.

"Do you see that gentleman leaning against the doorway?" he whispered in her ear. "He has been talking to the auctioneer. I have an idea that he is a connoisseur. He is always here and tries to outbid me. He has got wind of this original, you better believe.'

Mrs. Wade glanced at the gentleman in question, and mentally wondered if her husband was to deteriorate into that dilapidated condition, after a continued pursuance of his infatuation.

"What did I tell you!" he ejaculated warningly, when the auctioneer had taken his stand on a stool, and the gentleman by the doorway had moved forward. "He is beginning to show interest. See him swallowing? It is a sure sign. There's only one way to beat him-and that is, to buy the whole lot!"

"Oh, Wellington! But what will you do with them?"

"Sell them-throw them in the street-" was the frenzied reply, then, as if in fear of attracting suspicious notice, he suddenly subdued his tones. "Do you think I would risk losing a genuine Greuze? Flesh tints are very deceiving, and you can't trust these dealers, they will palm anything off on you. But when an expert like this man is so eager to secure an article there is something back of it, you may be sure."

His wife subsided with a sigh of resignation She would have to take up her abode in the elevator if this craze continued much longer. "How much am I offered?" chirped the auctioneer, "Worth $50, if it is a sou-60-75-"

It was a battle between two opposing forces for no one else seemed to desire to stake any large sum on these unattractive-looking spepast glory. Fortune favored archeologist, and a short space of time saw him the owner of the whole array of dingy daubs, and a debtor to the amount of a cool number of thousands.

It did not take long to summon an express man and have his newly acquired property carted to his uptown residence. Nor did he suffer them out of his sight, but took up his station beside the driver, leaving his wife to follow at her leisure.

"There are so many tricks of the trade." he managed to whisper to her, aside. "Besides. that man is not going to let such a treasure go if he can get hold of it, by fair means or foul.'

His wife patiently acquiesced in this new vagary, and followed on behind, reaching the house in time to see the queer assortment hang in single file on the walls of the collector's den. The collector himself stood in an attitude of attention, with his eyeglass in hand, trying to catch the light from every point of view.

He had been ashamed to show his inability to detect chef d'oeuvre in the auction room, and had seen no way out of the dilemma but to buy the whole lot. Now, for the same reason, he disliked to display ignorance in the

When physicians have said no cure was possible; when all other means and medicines have utterly failed to benefit, "Favorite Prescription" has been tried and its use has resulted in a perfect and permanent cure.

"Your letter just received," writes Miss Rose Kilfether, of 43 West Sharpnack St., Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa. "Words fail to express how thankful I am to you for your advice. I must confess that for the length of time I have been using your medicine 1 have found it to be the most wonderful and best remedy for female troubles that I ever have tried, and from now on I shall use no other. Sorry I did not know of your 'Favorite Prescription' years ago, but will gladly tell my friends who are suffering, of your wonderful medicine. I cannot speak too highly of it."

"You see, my dear, I was not rash," he confided later to his wife. "Not only did I hesitate to trust my own judgment, although I may humbly say that I have given considerable study to this subject, but I waited until I could secure indisputable proof of the authenticity of this painting. Mrs. Wade saw only a daub of dull brown curative power. There is no claim made for on a dark indistinguishable background, with Favorite Prescription" which is not backed a smattering of varnish over all, but she did not dare to utter this blasphemy aloud.

A month later they were passing the auction room, and seeing that some sale was in progress, Mr. Wellington Wade could not resist the fascination of crossing the charmed manuscripts and book-lore, a department in which he had not yet had the temerity to dabble.

The ruddy-faced auctioneer recognized, at once, a possible customer, and stopped on his brusque greeting and the suggestion that he should take a look around at the collection.

"By the way, what did you do with that job lot of paintings you got here a short time ago? I did not know but you were going to start a picture store."

Mr. Wade met the auctioneer's inquiry with knowing smile.

"Oh, I had an object-not quite that-but-"So I had supposed," returned the auctioneer, as he shifted his bundle from one arm to the

I racked my brains to guess what you were up to. We had a gem of a Greuze come in the collection, but that went at a private sale, an hour beforehand. I was offered such a big lump I couldn't afford to let it go. Not running away? Don't you want something in vellum or calf? We can give you a bargain."

Mr. Wade slowly shook his head. His lips were gray with a sudden pallor. His wife stepped forward to shield him, and the auctioneer hurried off with a cheery node

The collector stood for a while, listening to the sharp monotone—

"2-2.20-3-make it 4, madame-make it 4-" He seemed stunned by the shock of some sudden discovery. As he turned mechanically to leave, his wild, wondering gaze caught sight of a well-known figure, standing in the background, following the bids diligently. It was his opponent for the famous original! Could it be possible that this connoisseur had been deceived like himself? He was evidently a bookworm, as well as a virtuoso. He turned to a person standing near by.

"Can you tell me who the gentleman is who has just bid—the one with a catalogue in his hand-to the right?"

The stranger followed his glance, and then laughed significantly.

"Oh, he? Why, that's the auction-room crank. He isn't just right, you know. Wants to bid on everything. Nobody pays any attention to what he says-they just humor him. He's deaf, too. If you notice sharp you'll see that he chirps in after the auctioneer, every time.'

Mr. Wellington Wade looked steadily at the stranger for a moment; then he suddenly slipped away out of sight, without a glance at his wife, who had studiously kept her eyes in the opposite direction.

The following week, Mrs. Wade was returning home from market. As she reached the house she saw an express wagon standing in front of the door, while several men in overalls, were conveying the precious treasures of her husband's collection down the steps and depositing them very carefully in the cart. Their owner, who naturally might have been expected to appear in a distracted state of mindat sight of this sacrilegious proceeding, stood on the front porch, watching their movements with indifferent eyes.

'Why, Wellington, what does this mean?" his wife managed to gasp out, as her bewildered gaze travelled from the costly heap of venerable heirlooms to the placid countenance of their once proud possessor.

"Don't be alarmed, dear," and he drew her into the dismantled drawing-room and shut the door. "I have sold them all-every blessed one of the old traps, to the'--' Museum. You're all the treasure I want! Do you think I don't know how to appreciate a wife who is too loyal even to smile when her husband has made a fool of himself!"

Cheating Toonook.

An Incident in the Arctics.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ALEC VICNOR.

HE extreme northern portion of Alaska, bordering upon the Arctic Ocean, is a barren, rocky and treeless waste, sustaining little life of any kind, and given over to eternal snow and ice of the polar regions. It is inhabited by a race of people called Nakooruks, who live mainly along the coast. They are but few in number, and rapidly decreasing every year, so that it is doubtless but a short time before they will be extinct entirely. The Nakooruks are not true Esquimaux. Though closely allied to them, they nevertheless differ from them in many particulars. They do not build a house mer, called a "toopick", and their winter house is the "igloo", consisting of an excavation in the ground roofed over with driftwood or whalebone and covered with stones and earth; but it has the underground approach similar to the hut of the true Esquimau.

The life of the Nakooruks is very simple. They have no government, no laws, no organizations, and no enterprises; no rulers and no set customs. Nevertheless they live happily and peacefully for the most part, spending their time in hunting and fishing and sitting about their hearthstone, which consists of an oil lamp made of a long wooden trench.

They are remarkably free from vice and crime, and not even polygamy is common among them. One writer who spent much time in this uninviting region some years ago when their trile was more numerous than at present asserts that he heard of but one Nakooruk who had more than one wife.

When a Nakooruk man wants a wife, the when a Nakooruk man wants a wife, the custom is for him to purchase the object of his choice from her parents, but the price demanded is not usually one which would necessitate starting out in matrimony a bankrupt. Girls who are so unfortunate as to be without parwho are so unfortunate as to be without parents marry whoever they please, and indeed are expected to support and care for themselves until marriage, yet no objection is raised to their presence, and they may take up an abode with whatever family they choose, but in this case must be purchased upon marriage.

These people are all superstitious, constantly resorting to all sorts of charms and conjuring resorting to all sorts of charms and conjuring to drive away evil spirits, and especially "Too-nook", the chief evil spirit, or devil. To avoid him they resort to all kinds of devices, pronounce incantations, wear charmed beads upon their clothing which their "medicine men" have endowed with the power of driving him away, and offer gifts, that the great terror of their lives may be appeased; and anyone supposed to have offended Toonook is regarded with the utmost horror.

Some years ago it was reported that the coast.

posed to have offended Toonook is regarded with the utmost horror.

Some years ago it was reported that the coast of Alaska bordering upon the Arctic Ocean was rich in coal veins of great depth and value, and I was sent out by a company of capitalists to investigate the matter and report as to the feasibility of mining it. During my explorations I necessarily mingled with the Nakooruks, and my every move was the wonder and curiosity or an ever increasing company which constantly followed me about.

During my stay among these people, in some way the idea became prevalent among them that Toonook had been offended by some occurrence, they knew not what, and that it would be necessary to appease him. For some days great excitement prevailed among them, and whispered consultations were constantly being held, the meaning of which I could not understand, but imagine my surprise on learning from the guide that I had brought with me from Point Barrow that an offering was to be made of a most revolting character.

From what he told me I gathered that he knew it to be a custom among these people, at times of the greatest apprehension on account of Toonook, to offer him portions of a human body to quiet his ill will, and on one occasion which he could remember, an old woman having died unaccountably, which was attributed to his anger, as a ceremony of respect toward him that he might not afflict the tribe farther, four aged women were chosen from among them, who after having blackened their faces, were to open the body of the dead woman, remove her heart, and marching with it to the seashore cast it upon the waves as an offering to this offended spirit. knew it to be a custom among these people, at

to this offended spirit.

Now there was among the Nakooruks at the time of my visit a not uncomely young woman by the name of Tanooli. She was so unfortunate as to have lost her parents in childfortunate as to have lost her parents in childhood, but had taken up a residence with one of the families of the tribe, and was regarded as one of them, according to their custom. It had not escaped my notice that my guide had at once been much impressed with the charms of this young woman, and from the first it was evident that he was intending to purchase her with trinkets and so on which I had promised him in return for his services, and which it would be necessary for him to do to gain her, on account of her long residence with an adopted family.

The story of my guide was that no one having died in the tribe recently, he feared that they might do her violence, she being friendless. Whether this was the unjustifiable fear of a jealous lover, or a ruse of some kind on the part of this seemingly simple native, I did not know. I had never known or heard of human sacrifice being practiced among the Esquimaux, but Leventheless are well to de what Leventheless are read to de whet Levell to the service of the seeming that they make the level the service of t part of this seemingly simple native, I did not know. I had never known or heard of human sacrifice being practiced among the Esquimaux, but I nevertheless agreed to do what I could to rescue the young woman from the fate which he seemed to think was awaiting her.

The question then was, how should I go about it? If we should take the girl by force and carry her off, the natives would at once doubtless follow in pursuit, and as they were possessed of wonderful powers of endurance, would easily overtake us, in which case it might go hard with all of us.

At length I hit upon an idea which I thought worth trying, at any rate, and through the assistance of my guide as interpreter and with such few words of their language as I could speak, I informed them that I had been given to understand that Toonook had become offended with them, and that they were about making him a peace offering. I suggested that it was my belief that their offended deity would be much more pleased with some of the trinkets which I had in my luggage than anything else, and ended by offering to purchase Tanooli, that they might present the proceeds to Toonook.

My offer was readily accepted, and I gave as to Toonook.

My offer was readily accepted, and I My offer was readily accepted, and I gave as a price for the young woman a handful of bright beads and a hatchet, of the value in all of about fifty cents. The beads, I noticed, disappeared unaccountably almost at once, but the hatchet was borne to the matchet.

appeared unaccountably almost at once, but the hatchet was borne to the water's edge after many incantations and with great ceremony, and cast into the waves for Toonook.

Thus I assured myself that I had settled the whole affair most satisfactorily, and was congratulating myself with not a little pride on my shrewdness and diplomacy, when a new state of affairs presented itself which put an entirely new aspect upon the matter. Having purchased Tanooli she was now my wife, according to the customs of the Nakooruks, and nothing would do but that I must take her as nothing would do but that I must take her as my wife at once. Now the reader must be informed that there chanced to be a certain fair haired young lady back in the city of Chicago, whose image was stamped indelibly for all time upon my heart stamped indelibly for all time upon my heart and mind, so that for this reason above every other a Nakooruk bride was out of the question with me. Add to this the fact that my guide, at the turn which affairs had taken, quite unexpectedly to him, was sulking about in a manner and with a look which boded no good for me, and certainly no peace of mind for him. It was evident that he would not part with his intended bride without a struggle, at least.

Again I was compelled to put my powers to the test, and commanding my companion to pack up our things for an immediate departure, I began bidding the Nakooruks an affectionate farewell, and conducting myself as though I was about to start on my long journey home again. My new wife I placed upon my sledge and tucked her in with many robes and furs; my tent was struck and packed behind her, and the dogs which composed my train captured and fastened in the harness. I then cracked my whip about their ears, and away of course I don't believe in prize fighter in America, the world's champion at that time.

"Sh—" said the man fumbling awkwardly in his vest pocket with his left hand. "Keep it mum," he added, and laid a $20 bill on the table in front of his companion.

"Keep your money," the boy said, pushing the bill back across the table, his face flushing. "I hope I can do a man a favor without being fail of it.

"Besides," he added, "I'm real glad to have a chance to see one I've read so much about. Of course I don't believe in prize fighting," he

we went at as fast a pace as I could command running beside the leader, while my native as-sistant followed doggedly on behind, scarcely knowing what to say or do, in his chagrin and disappointment.

The Nakooruks waved their adieus to us, and were slow in following after, as I hoped they might be, and indeed could not have broken camp at once, being taken by surprise at the suddenness of my departure. A light snow was on the ground, having recently fallen, and we made such good time that within an hour we had covered fully eight or ten miles, and were well out of the way of our possible followers. sible followers.

I then called a halt, and motioning the native to the side of the sledge, performed, as best I was able, the marriage ceremony according to our customs between him and the object of his affections. When I explained to him the meaning of my words his joy knew no bounds. I could scarcely make him realize it, for it all seemed to him too good to be true, and I could tell from the way he looked at me that he regarded me as simple minded to have parted garded me as simple minded to have parted with such a prize.

I continued my explorations for a month longer, the bride and groom assisting me in my work, but no trouble arose among the Nakmy work, but no trouble arose among the Nakooruks over the exchange of grooms in the marriage ceremony, it having escaped their knowledge and attention. Thus Toonook was cheated out of all but a hatchet, and the Point Barrow native got a wife for nothing. I often wonder what he would have thought if he could have seen the blushing American bride which I led to the altar, not long after my return to Chicago!

OHN Ruggles swung himself from the platform of a country station onto the steps of one of the cars of a New York bound train just as the train started. He waved his hand to a little group of persons standing on the platform.

"Good by! Good by! Good Luck!" they cried.

"Thank you!" he shouted back, his eyes shining with excitement and pleasure. "Good by!"

The young man stood looking back until the station and the water tank and the freight house, all so familiar to his eyes, had slipped out of sight. When he turned to enter the passenger coach he saw that it was crowded. Every seat seemed full. The car ahead was the smoker. It did not seem to be so crowded. He walked up the aisle. One half a double seat with a card table in the middle was empty, and putting his bag in the rack, the boy, for he was little more than that, sat down.

A brakeman, coming down the aisle, laid some telegraph blanks on the table. "Here's your blanks, sir," he said.

The man who was sitting in the other half of the seat smoothed out a crumpled telegram on the table and read it over and over. Then he the seat smoothed out a crumpled telegram on the table and read it over and over. Then he glanced questioningly out from under heavy eyebrows towards the face of the young man who had sat down opposite him. He was a large man with massive shoulders, and a hand so big that it could almost have covered the piece of yellow paper on the table from sight. "I say," he finally asked of his seatmate, "do you happen to have a pencil about you?" Ruggles had been looking out of the car window.

"I think I have," he said, turning to see who had spoken to him. He took a pencil from his pocket and handed it across the table.

The man took the pencil in his left hand, but made no attempt to use it. He twisted around in the seat and read the telegram over once

"Certainly," the boy said. "What is it?"

The man pushed the blanks and the pencil towards him. "I got a line at A——," he said, "wanting an answer. If I don't send it from the next stopping place it won't get to New York in time." He leaned still further over the table and gave an address. Ruggles wrote it down.

"No. Can't do it," the man dictated. "Right hand knocked out. No good for four weeks."

We can't all be alike," the man said, smiling, but his own face, ruddy as it had been before, flushed a deeper shade. "Sign the message; and then I wonder if you'd step off at this station we are coming to and send it for me. I don't like to trust the brakeman." "Sure," said the young man. "Glad to do it."

Three hours later the train had pulled into the Grand Central Station and the passengers were crowding out towards 42nd street.

"I leave you here, I reckon," the champion said, reaching out his left hand. "Remember, now, if ever I can do anything for you, let me know. Good by."

John Ruggles had come to New York—as thousands of young men had come before him.

thousands of young men had come before him, as thousands will come after him—to seek that as thousands will come after him—to seek that fortune which every honest, ambitious young man may rightfully believe the world holds for him. He was better prepared for the attempt than many of the candidates, and he realized that fact. He had youth, health, strength, a fair education, and money enough to support him economically for two or three months if he did not get work at once. How fortunate he really was he realized even better, later, when a month had passed and he had not yet got work. It was a warm autumn. People were coming back to the city late that year. Business was slow to start up. Nobody seemed to want to hire more help just then.

year. Business was slow to start up. Nobody seemed to want to hire more help just then. The young countryman did not care so very much. His-money held out well, and he believed that the knowledge of New York which he was getting would be of service to him sometime. He felt that he knew the city pretty well, now, and smiled sometimes to himself, as he thought how much he could tell the fellows back at home about streets, squares. fellows back at home about streets, squares, buildings, people and places which once had been only mysterious names to him.

One unusually warm evening he had been tempted to sit out on one of the benches in Madison Square Park later than he had ever stayed there before. Some of the city's myriad lights had been put out, and the street car loads of returning theater goers had gone home. One by one the men who had spent the evening in the park, and who had homes to go to, had begun to disappear in the darkness; and a policeman had made one round to batter awake the homeless ones who planned to spend the night on the park benches.

A stout man on one end of the bench on which Ruggles sat had been asleep for an hour.

A slim young fellow with thin sharp face, sauntering along the walk with his hands in his pockets, dropped down on an adjoining bench on the other side, stretched his arms above his head and yawned sleepily.

"Can you tell me what time it is?" he asked, turning towards Ruggles.

Swish! Thud!

Three minutes later the young countryman had struggled upright on the seat again, and was pulling out of his mouth a coarse hand-kerchief which had been wadded into it.

His watch, his wallet, all his money—even the silver in his change pocket—were gone, and with it had gone the young man with the smooth face and his accomplice, the stout man

Ruggles had seen the sign many times before, but never had been into the building, and had not seen the champion since that day on the train.

Now the man's words came back to him. "If ever I can do anything for you, let me

He hesitated, walked past the place twice on the opposite side of Broadway, and then crossed the street and went in. The brilliant lights, the mirrored walls, the glistening glasses, the crowds of men, the smoke, confused him for a moment. He never had been in such a place before.

"What's yours?" one of the white clad men behind the bar asked him, as he set a bottle back in its place.

"Nothing," said Ruggles. "I want to see Mr.—Is he here?"

"In back, there," was the answer, and the speaker pointed to an inner room, partly curtained off from the front part of the saloon. Ruggles pushed past the curtains into a richly carpeted room. Big stuffed chairs, upholstered in fragrant leather, were grouped around tables at which men were smoking and drinking. The softly shaded lights flashed back from more big diamonds than the country boy had ever seen before. At one of the tables sat the man whom he had seen on the train. Ruggles touched him on the shoulder.

the man whom he had seen on the train. Ruggles touched him on the shoulder.

"May I speak with you alone?" he said.
The man looked up, wonderingly, at first. Then a light of recognition came into his face.
"Sure," he said. "Sure. Glad to see you. Where have you been all this time? Come this way," and then, as he rose to lead the way to an empty corner, "Excuse me, boys."
The story was an awkward one to tell, but Ruggles waded through it. The man listening to him swore softly to himself two or three times, but made no other interruption until the boy was finished. Then, with his broad back turned to the room so that no one could see what he was doing, he pressed a bill into the boy's hand.

"Take that for now," he said. "Call it you borrow it, if you want to. You can pay it back somet ime. It ain't the money we mind, though. It's being done up that way, that cuts. Now listen. Would you know them beats again?"

"I think so. Yes, I know I'd know the big fellow. I saw a scar on his cheek, when the evening the same stout man lounged down on to a bench and apparently went to sleep, just as he had done before.

Half an hour later, Ruggles and a large man wearing a long overcoat and a slouch hat sauntered up the walk and took seats on each side of the sleeping man. The Square was almost deserted. "It's all right," he hissed into the captive's ear, when the latter would have freed himself.

"You'll keep quiet all right enough. You know you don't want any row, just as well as anybody else. There'd be more than this boy to make you trouble if you did." Ruggles had pulled off the moustache. "We'll just see what you've got left of his."

The man bit his lips until they bled.

"The ticket for the watch is in my vest pocket," he finally said.

The champion held the thief's hand and directed Ruggles to the pocket, where he found a yellow pawn ticket.

"How about the money?"

"Ispent it," the man said sullenly.

"Of course. But I reckon you've got more by this time. Where is it?" The words were accompanied by a squeeze such as a grizzly bear might have given.

"That's all right," said the man. "I owed you one, anyway: I say," he added," let me help you more. I can give you a good job in that place of mine, any day. Good pay, too." "Thank you," said the young man. "Thank you very much. You're very kind, but I don't think—, I mean I'm afraid I shouldn't want—." He stammered again, and stopped. "I see," said the man, after a minute, speaking slowly, but not unkindly. "I see, I understand. It's not the kind of a place you're looking for."

He reached out his hand and closed that of the boy in its strong clasp.

MURDERED IN HIS'OWN HOUSE! PRESIDENT LEEDS OF THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK! NO CLEW TO THE ASSASSIN!

HE above startling headlines appeared in a New York paper under the date of November 23, 1893, and following this was a detailed account of one of the most mysterious murders with which the police had dealt in

It seemed that the aged president of the bank was alone in his library, presumably passing a pleasant evening among his books. Other members of the family had gone to the theater, the servants, as was their custom, remaining in a remote part of the house. No one was seen to enter or leave the house during the evening, yet shortly before eleven o'clock the banker was found dead before the fireplace, an ugly bullet hole indicating the instrument of death.

Until within a few months of the tragedy there had been in Mr. Leeds' employ, acting in the capacity of butler, a man of the name of Haley. This man had been discharged for some irregularity and threats which he had made within hearing of members of the family and others, caused the finger of suspicion to be pointed to him. Within twelve hours of the discovery of the murder this man was arrested, and being unable to give a satisfactory account of himself and his whereabouts on the night of the tragedy, he was committed to the tombs.

the tragedy, he was committed to the tombs.

Neil Hessmer, the detective assigned to the case, secured considerable evidence that pointed strongly to Haley as the murderer, and it was believed that the suspected man would find it difficult to clear himself.

From servants in the employ of Mrs. Leeds it was found that Haley had been seen in the city only once, so far as known, since the day that he was discharged from service. Unfortunately for Haley, this was just at twilight the day that the crime was committed. When searched at headquarters a revolver was found upon his person of the same calibre as that used by the assassin, and this coupled with the fact that he was unwilling or unable to account for the hours between six o'clock and midnight on that fatal day, constituted a large share of the evidence against the man.

Meanwhile, another detective, John Fanshawe, whose services had been secured by Mrs. Leeds, was at work on the case, following up an entirely different clew of which Neil Hessmer had not the slightest knowledge.

"The morning following my husband's death that parrot said a most remarkable thing." said

Hessmer had not the slightest knowledge.

"The morning following my husband's death that parrot said a most remarkable thing," said Mrs. Leeds, talking the case over with Fanshawe, indicating a large parrot that hung in the library. "Only once since the tragedy has the bird spoken, and then it was so loud and spiteful that it frightened the maid so that she will have nothing to do with this room. 'Crapo, I know you!' that was what the bird said and he screamed so loudly that I heard it myself at the other end of the house."

"Did you think that it had some bearing upon the case?" queried the detective.

"Yes, I believe it has a direct bearing upon it.
The name is an odd one and the instant I heard it, it flashed upon me where I had heard the name before. Years ago my husband brought about the arrest of a man of the name of Rufus Crapo, and as a result this man served time in prison. I have not seen him from that day to this, but the thought occurred to me that Crapo, prompted by a feeling of revenge, was the man that murdered my husband." "Where did this man live when arrested?"

asked the detective, making notes of what was "In Chicago; I do not know the street."

"His business?"

"His business?"
"He was watchman at the bank with which my husband was connected at that time."
That evening Detective Fanshawe took the midnight express for Chicago, arriving at his destination on time the following day. It was his intention to hunt up Crapo, and if he succeeded in locating him, arrest the man on susnicion. picion.

From the authorities the detective learned From the authorities the detective learned that Crapo had served a five years' sentence at Joliet; had returned to Chicago at the end of that time and till within about three years had been drifting about the city from place to place, usually acting in the capacity of servant. Three years since, however, he had suddenly dropped out of sight, and when the detective attempted to locate him he found there was absolutely no tree of the man in the city. solutely no trace of the man in the city. interesting and important clew that he had run across since his interview with Mrs. Leeds. The name R. Crapo was written upon one of the books of the company, indicating the address for delivering a valise.

Going to the street and number given by the express agent, the detective learned that a gentleman of that name had engaged a room there about a fortnight previous and remained three days; since then, however, he had not been seen and his valise still remained in his room.

Having shown his authority, the detective was permitted to examine the contents of the valise, and the first thing that he saw convinced him that he was on the right track—it was a box of cartridges of the same calibre as that used by the murderer. Next, he found a letter addressed to Josiah Haiey, the man now under arrest and being tried for murder. How did Crapo come by this letter, and why had he failed to return for his property when his grip contained such damaging testimony against him?

For a time the detective worked in the dark as it were, searching the city for Crapo, but three days from the time that he located Crapo's three days from the time that he located Crapo's last lodging-place before committing the murder, as he firmly believed he had done, light broke, and the detective called himself several very uncomplimentary names for not seeing the point at the start.

Meanwhile the trial of Josiah Haley was drawing to a close and in spite of the determined efforts of the state's attorney to convict the man, it seemed more than probable that Haley would escape through lack of positive evidence. evidence evidence.

It was the last day of the trial. Suddenly a stranger was seen elbowing his way through the crowd of men and women, and coming before the judges, asked to be sworn in.

Having served his time, this young man went to work, securing the position of hostler, his employer being one of the wealthy men of the city. From place to place he drifted, unable to hold any position for long, and the while a thought rankled within his breast, a hungering for revenge, a desire to wreak vengeance upon the man who brought him to justice.

"Finally he succeeded in locating the man whom he hated, and changed as he was in appearance, for many years had elapsed since he first entered the prison, he succeeded in securing the position of butler in the home of the man against whom he was plotting.

"Two years this man planned and plotted until finally the night came that he put his plans in execution. The master of the house had discharged him some months previous, but that did not hinder the carrying out of his murderous intentions, in fact it facilitated matters. Other members of the family were absent, and stealthily entering the house by an entrance he knew too well, the assassin suddenly confronted the aged man. The banker looked up from his book and saw his former butler before him; but not only did he see Josiah Haley, but Rufus Crapo as well, at last penetrating the disguise of years.

"'Crapo, I know you!' he cried, and an instant later the murder was committed.

"'Arresting Haley, Crapo was arrested; trying Haley, Crapo has been tried; convicting Haley, you will convict Crapo, the murderer of Henry A. Leeds."

Evidence was given proving Detective Fanshawe's remarkable words were true and an

LITTLE SWEETHEARTS.

Learning there was a cure for drunkenness which she could give her husband secretly, she decided to try it. She mixed it in his food and coffee and as the remedy is odorless and tasteless he never knew what it was that so quickly relieved the craving for liquor. He soon began to pick up in flesh, his appetite for solid food returned, he stuck to his work regularly and they now have a happy home. Mr. Harry was told about his wife's experiment and he gives her the credit of having restored him to his senses. It is certainly a remarkable remedy, cures a man without his effort, does him no harm and causes him no suffering whatever.

The death of Queen Victoria took place shortly after noon on Tuesday, January 22nd of this year, after an illness extending at the most only a few days, and which culminated in a stroke of apoplexy the Friday previous to her death. On Saturday the news was sent all over the world, which prepared the world for the closing event of this wonderful life; and through Sunday and Monday it was known that Her Majesty was within the valley of the shadow, so that the end on Tuesday was no surprise, it being recognized that her holding out was a mere question of intense vitality.

So full have been the newspaper accounts of the decease of the Queen, and the consequent and subsequent accession to authority of him who has been so long known as the Prince of Wales, Albert Edward, who was proclaimed King Edward VII. upon the day of the death of the Queen, that it is inadvisable to enter into any extended account of these latter days; but it seems fitting to briefly narrate the principal events of this long and distinguished reign, and more especially from the fact that the monarch was a woman and within the period of her reign, for the first time in the history of civilization, womanhood has taken its proper place and proper rights in the social sphere, and that reign, for the first time in the history of civilization, womanhood has taken its proper place and proper rights in the social sphere, and that its advancement has been contemporaneous with the life of this one royal person. It is an event in history which should impress itself deeply upon all those who are able to comprehend it, as being an event marking the termination of one of the most celebrated reigns in the whole annals of history.

Queen Victoria was born May 24, 1819, and at that time was not looked upon as being a probable successor to the throne; but a series of deaths brought her as heir to the throne, on June 20, 1837. A year after that date, June 28, 1838, she was crowned with great demonstration and ceremony in Westminster Abbey. At that time the first steamship had crossed with Lord Melbourne as Prime Minister, and the first year was much taken up with a war which was being carried on in India. In 1840 she mar-ried Prince Albert, who was there-after known as the Prince Consort. It is the most remarkable phase of Vic-toria's long reign, not-withstanding that she was a poten-tate of the tate of the most important country in the world, that she grew steadily in grace and favor with the people, and through the whole she appealed not only to her own countrymen but to the citizens of the whole world more in the character of the mother and wife than as Queen. It is hardly remembered as a possible thing at this day that her accession to the throne was by no means popular, and threatened at its commencement very serious difficulties.

Only in the death of our own Lincoln can we see any appreciation of the sincere and hearttate

Only in the death of our own Lincoln can we see any appreciation of the sincere and heartfelt sorrow, deep concern, and great sympathy, and a sense of personal loss among all people as has followed the death of Queen Victoria.

Her marriage to Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg, was brought about largely through her uncle, King Leopold. The Prince was of attractive personality, handsome, cultivated, and most unselfish and engaging. Their marriage without doubt was one of pure affection rather than royal convenience. It is said that throughout his life his whole heart was given to the Queen, and he worked for and thought of nothing else. At that time Parliament and the British people acted toward them ungraciously in allowances, but their love grew and strengthened with every day. The subsequent publication of Victoria's book, giving the Prince Consort's private letters, threw a light, apon, his character that showed to the the Prince Consort's private letters, threw a light upon his character that showed to the world his true worth as a man.

The happiness of the home was a particular trait in which Queen Victoria thoroughly exemplified a natural characteristic of her people, and it was realized in the two country seats, Osborne, where she died, and Balmoral, a castle in Scotland. Osborne was an estate on the Isle of Wight which, by chance, the Prince Consort happened upon as an attractive marine resort. Together they laid out the grounds and a model farm, and between this home and Balmoral most of their time was spent in domestic care and improvement, the same as people in the ordinary walks of life. Their married life was twenty-one years, and the Prince Consort's demise left her inconsolable.

To attempt to give any part of the historical view of her reign would be giving the world's history of more than half a century. It has been a reign partly peaceful, but interspersed with wars of serious moment, and closing with the unsuppressed war in South Africa. Nothing can indicate more clearly the immense extension of the territory owned by England. In 1837, it owned British North America, English Guiana, and the continent of Australia, and a small portion of India. To-day it owns not only all of these, but the entire country through India, and a large portion of the African con-India, and a large portion of the African con-tinent, besides a majority of the islands in the Pacific.

In the year 1876 the Queen was proclaimed Empress of India in London, which title has since been one of the principal names attached to the crown.

The most noticeable event, probably of her The most noticeable event, probably of her life, was the tremendous demonstration in the year 1897 on the occasion of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee. Naval and military displays, with ships and troops in every part of the Queen's dominions throughout the world, served to enhance the enthusiasm of the British people and give a display unequaled in the rejoicings of any nation of which we have any history. As was stated at the beginning of this short article, the public press has given the world such ample accounts that it seems scarcely necessary to add any review of either the Queen's reign or the later events. The present King, Edward VII., is one of the very few princes of royal blood that have ever visited the United States. In 1860 the Queen gave her royal assent to the Prince of Wales visiting the north British provinces, and it soon afterwards became known through the newspaper press.

If, however, you have plenty of ground at your disposal you may have ever, you have plenty of ground at your disposal you may have them in abundance if you will but give them faithful and intelligent care.

In recent years there has been a return to the lovely old flowers of our grandmothers' days in flower gardening, and beautiful flowers they are. Nothing could be more daintily exquisite than the Sweet Pea once so dear to our grandmothers. It is an easily grown flower and is free from insects, but it must be planted very early to make sure of doing its best. One can and should sow seeds of the Sweet Pea just as soon as the frost is out of the ground. This will be by the first of April in even the northern climate. The small, velvety looking brown seeds have remarkable vitality, and a little freezing of the surface of the ground after the seeds are sown will not hurt them in the least. Be sure and sow the seeds at least five inches deep. It is a good plan to dig a trench about six inches deep and sow in it a double row of seeds covering them to a depth of about two and a half inches at first, and filling in the rest of the trench as the plants grow. This will make the plants stronger at the roots. Early planting enables the Sweet Pea to become a strong and thrifty plant before the extreme heat of summer sets in. It is sensitive to the heat, and it is a great drinker. Give it water in great quantities. Do not allow it to become dry around the roots or its vitality will depart not to return. When you see your Sweet Peas turning yellow just above the ground you may be sure that they are suffering from a lack of moisture at the roots. It is difficult to restore them to their former vigor after the yines

A small package of seeds will sow quite a large bed, and the number of flowers such a bed will produce is surprising. And it may be that no two of the flowers will be just alike. They are apt to be of every conceivable tint and hue. I once saw a small bed in which there were more than one hundred blossoms, and no two were alike. They were infinite in variety, and it would have been hard to say which was the most beautiful. If you have never had any experience with this beautiful little flower give it a place in your flower garden this summer and it will be sure to delight you.

The Morning Glory is another old-fashioned flower that has again come into favor. It is no longer spoken of as "such a common flower," and there are some new varieties that are extremely beautiful. The Japanese Morning Glories grow like weeds, and send forth thousands of beautiful blossoms. Nothing is better for the lattice work of porches or to grow on a trellis of any kind than the Morning Glory. It makes very rapid growth, and a five-cent package of seeds will give you hundreds of blossoms. Give the seeds ordinary garden soil, plenty of water in times of drouth, and you will have flowers galore.

The nasturtium is another easily grown plant that is immensely popular and justly so for it is a remarkably prolific bloomer and its flowers are of so many tints and shades. The nasturtium is not a high feeder. Indeed, it will be likely to run largely to leaves if given rich soil. Sow the seeds in only moderately rich soil if you want many flowers. The illustration shows how the E. J. Worst Scientific Catarrh Inhaler sends the medicated air into every air passage of the head. Nothing but air can penetrate these fine air cells and reach the homes of the living germs that cause disease. No snuff, powders, douche or spray can possibly reach them. Don't be deceived—make no mistake—apply common sense, and you will find that is the only instrument that will give you quick return for a small outlay, and perfect satisfaction as a Cure for Catarrh, Colds, Pains and Roaring in the Head, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Headache, Partial Deafness, and all Diseases of the Air Passages.

THE E. J. WORST'S SCIENTIFIC CATARRH INHALER THE ONLY ONE ENDORSED BY THE U.S. HEALTH REPORTS.

It is a pocket physician, so simple that a child can use it anywhere at any time. The principle of inhalation is the most perfect yet devised. Once charging lasts for months. It is 12 months' treatment for $1.00 and about 12 times as much cure as you can get anywhere for the price. It destroys the germs of disease with a new germicide.

I received the Inhaler, and broke up a cold in two days. It is worth three times what you ask for it. Very respectfully, I. W. PARKS, Fair Haven, Vt.

I enclose $1.00 for the Inhaler. The Inhaler is doing me much good and I would not take $20.00 for it if I could not get another.

Yours truly,

WM. CHAPPLE, Vendalia, Mich.

I have received the Inhaler and use it according to directions. I would not take $5.00 and be without it. Yours truly, JOHN H. GATES, Tyrone, Pa.

I have used your Inhaler for Catarrh of many years standing, and now I am entirely cured. I have used other remedies and other Inhalers, and nothing gave me permanent relief until I used yours.

MRS. M. E. DAVIS, Newton, Kan.

SPECIAL OFFER.

For a short time, I will mail to any reader, naming this paper, one of my new Scientific Catarrh Inhalers, with medicine for one year on three days' trial free. If it gives satisfaction, send me $1.00; if not, return it after three days' trial. Could any proposition be fairer?

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

OMMONSENSE is coming more and more to the fore in the matter of dress with the result that no one style predominates either in the way of head-gear coats, skirts or boots. It also shows itself in its approval of the healthful, erect figure, neither too much given over to flesh nor yet too scrawny. Just the supple plump sort of woman who is not afraid of exercise or her bath; who does not pinch her waist or make herself otherwise uncomfortself otherwise uncomfortable: and who can consequently carry herself with grace and wear her "things" with an ease and freedom denied her more slavish sisters. Far more attention is given to the artistic in dress than to the really fashionable, affording a limit fashionable, affording a limitless range for the tasteful woman. Rich or exaggerated dress does not imply attractiveness in its best sense. A woman of good carriage is far more pleasing to look upon, in her plain black tailor-made gown, with the well-cut skirt, and graceful, rather loose jacket, her small, flat toque, her tastefully arranged throat hands and feet, than the woman in velvet and costly furs if the latter are badly chosen and she is naturally devoid of style.

The newest skirts, nearly all of them, are made with separate silk lining, trimmed with a dust ruffle 5 inches wide underneath, and an accordion-pleated flounce 9 inches wide on top.
There is a strong preference for the softest of accordion-pleated flounce 9 inches wide on top. There is a strong preference for the softest of silks and satins for dress linings, they cling to the figure so nicely. These clinging linings are especially useful to stout women, and are often substituted for a petticoat. I know a young woman whose hips are rather too large for real beauty, who never wears a petticoat except, of course, with a thin gown, depending on the silken lining of her skirts to fill the deficiency.

There is a rumor that spring styles are to be simpler, skirts plainer and waists not so lavishly decorated, still this seems hardly likely when one sees the models which have already reached this side and which are marvels of daintiness and elegance and perfect wonders of hand work. French knots, such as are used in embroidery are lavished on waists and coats regardless of the time necessary to do them. One dainty use to which they are put is to dot the panne border on a tucked silk bolero. This border consists of a band of black panne velvet put irregularly along the edge and feather-stitched onto the silk with coarse gold thread, this same thread being used to dot the velvet at regular intervals. Loops of twisted gold cord and tiny, round gold buttons finish the front. A soft, old-fashioned silk, changeable in color, in all the light shades, is among the season's novelties, and is attractively made up into separate bodices and gowns. A dainty gown of this in green and white shades, having a tucked skirt, the tucks stitched to within a short distance of the foot where they flare beautifully, while around the hem of the skirt is a tracery of silver thread and coral beads, a delicious combination. The waist is soft and full with considerable pouch in front, the shoulders embellished with traceries of the silver and coral, carrying out the effect of a yoke.

About the throat is a stock composed of folded yellow net, arranged at one side in a soft knot with ends falling quite to the waist. This stock is surmounted by a narrow band of coral pink velvet, and a narrow belt of the same give the finishing founds to expelly which contrares. finishing touches to a really chic costume. A charming bodice in the pale pink shades of this silk is delicately embroidered by hand with white, the daintiness increased by the undersleeves of spotted white net, and the long scarf of net worn at the waist. Among the skirts of the season there is one of extreme attractiveness because of its newnes

The effect of the skirt is very clinging to the knees, where there is a wide flare, but quite soft in effect as the goods is un-lined. The upper portion of the skirt is cut en princess and reaches almost to the bust, the soft waist blousing over the top a trifle. These skirts are cut in seven gores, which fact simplifies the mat-ter of fitting them properly. With this is worn

With this is worn a very short bolero, hanging quite loosely and provided with elbow sleeves, having large loose cuffs.

Fancy revers are among the attributes of many of the dressy toilettes and there are certainly bits of elegance among them. A beautiful white satin set has a covering of white net to which are applied large flowers of shaded to which are applied large flowers of shaded purple or pink creton, the edges beautifully worked with white silk and gold thread, French knots of white mixed with those of gold scattered over the net, adding to its daintiness. Another handsome set of revers are of black peans velvet combined with white setting. black panne velvet combined with white satin the black showing an elaborate design carried out in steel or gold beads and delicate hand embroidery. Cuffs are to be a feature of the spring toilette when the latter is purely tailor-made. A fascinating set has the broad collar with its square edges, and cuffs of a like shape, finished with an inch wide hemstitched hem.

The effect when worn upon a gown of black or blue is especially natty.

Mohair, the soft, lusterless sort which wears so splendidly, is to be a spring favorite, especially in the shade of dark blue bordering on navy. A smart model made up in this material has a skirt laid in narrow pleats, each stitched with white, and finished with a border of several rows of white stitching along the hem. The pleats run into a small yoke fitted over the hips, which is stitched also. The short, loose Eton has a stitched border running all around it, and a shawl collar of white mohair stitched with blue. Small buttons of silver The effect when worn upon a gown of black or stitched with blue. Small buttons of silver finish the coat. Skirts need quite as much care as bodices, in fact, upon the skirt lies a large share of the success of the gown. The subject of lining stuffs has already been touched up-on. The majority of skirt linings are made on the drop skirt idea and are finished separately. Some-times hair cloth is used in the drop skirt, and sometimes not, but whenever it does appear, only does appear, only a narrow band is seen. In using hair cloth for this purpose it is well to bind the edges with lining to to bind the cub with lining to prevent them from cutting through the material. In joining the hair cloth lap the selvedges, and sew together with short stitches. When fastening the stiffening to the foundation a strip of silk should be placed over the hair cloth.

A good way to finish the top of a skirt is to cord it. This cording is prepared by covering a strong cable cord of medium weight with a bias strip of thin material, silk preferred, and sewing it to the top of the skirt after the latter has been fitted to the proper size. A linen tape must be sewed along the edge to prevent stretching and to reinforce the cord. A soft leather binding on the edge of a skirt is a stretching and to reinforce the cord. A soft leather binding on the edge of a skirt is a splendid finish. One edge of this binding may be pinked and the other adjusted in the usual manner. This binding is often preferred to any other in so far as it does not wear out easily and is soft enough not to ruin the shoes as so many of the bindings do.

If any reader suffering from rheumatism will write to me I will send him free of cost, a trial package of a simple and harmless remedy which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over 40 years standing. This is a grand remedy, and want every afflicted reader to learn by actual test, what marvelous power it has, and therefore will gladly send a sample free, even if more than 15,000 invalids should apply. Distressing cases of rheumatism, among them bedridden and crippled persons, were completely cured, of which I mention a few: A lady in Denham, Ind., writes that this remedy cured her, and she then cured 15 of her neighbors. In Lyon, Mo., it cured an old gentleman at the age of 32, who had been a sufferer for 40 years. In Seguin, Tex., it cured a case of 41 years standing. Hon. Jacob Sexauer of Fountain City, Wis., was cured after suffering for 33 years and after having employed 7 physicians. Miss Emma Callender at 130 Oak St. Vincennes. Ind., was cured after she was given up to die. Rev. S. Sund of Harrisville, Wis., writes that the remedy had cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 15, the other 25 years. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned, showing that here is a remedy that can be relied upon. Write at once for a trial package, for it is an honest remedy which you can test before spending a cent. Address:

plants, as seed sown in the open ground may not develop into blooming plants before the early frost cuts them down.

For absolute hardiness and general reliability nothing surpasses the Geranium. By all means have as many Geraniums as you can in your flower garden. They will do double duty, for you can take them up in the fall and have them in your windows all winter, but you must not expect them to bloom all summer in the outdoor garden and all winter in the window-gar-handsome plants for the window even though they do not bloom. You will find the single varieties to be freer bloomers than the double varieties, and they are greater in variety.

If you want some decorative plants you will find the Canna to be very satisfactory, and it will give a tropical effect to your garden. The new Flamingo is a superb blood red Canna, the flowers growing in very large clusters. Madame Crozy is another very fine Canna. If you want plants with brilliant foliage you cannot do better than to have a bed of Coleus. The Dr. Ross

All tints of yellow, crimson, green and pink are exquisitely blended in the leaves of this variety of the Coleus. The Admiral Dewey is a new variety. It has very large leaves with irregularly notched edges. It has a border of green with a center of crimson, pink and other tints. The Rainbow-Leaved Coleus is another splendid variety. The Coleus readily adapts itself to very ordinary soil, and it will grow with as little care as any plant I know of, but it is all the better for proper care.

plant I know of, but it is all the better for proper care.

Lovers of gorgeous yellow flowers will find the old-fashioned yellow Marigold to be a very satisfactory plant. Its flowers are very large and of a glowing yellow, and it will grow in almost any situation. The velvet Marigolds are also very pretty. A daintier and more graceful yellow flower with a beautiful satiny sheen, is the Eschscholtzia or California Poppy. Its foliage is as finely cut as the foliage of the fern, and is of a pale green contrasting charmingly with the pale yellow flowers. But one must enjoy its beauty while it is on the parent stem, for, like other members of the Poppy family, it wilts almost as soon as it is cut. The Calliopsis is another graceful and pretty yellow flower that will grow in any ordinary garden dinary garden soil. For borders nothing is better than the dainty and fragrant white Alyssum. The seed should be sown very early in the open ground. The small, silver-leaf Gerani-um makes a showy and at-tractive border, but one must have a great many plants, and a ten-cent package of Alyssum will make as much of a border as a dollar's worth of Geranium plants.

Every one likes at least a few plants of the good old-fashioned Balsam in the flower garden. The plant has no beauty, being stiff and ungainly, but the flowers are as dainty and beautiful as the blossoms of the Camelia and they come in wonderful profusion. Sow the seed so that the plants will stand about eighteen inches apart. The spotted and striped Balsams are very striking but one cannot always depend upon the seeds producing flowers like those from which the seeds were formed. They are rather freaky in this respect. But all Balsam flowers are lovely, and there should be a few stalks in every garden.

Then one will want at least a small bed of

Then one will want at least a small bed of Phlox Drummondi, with its flowers of every conceivable shade and hue. It is one of the best of bedding plants. If you want to try a "ribbon bed" you will find the Phlox Drummondi to be just the thing for it. The Grover Cleveland is a splendid variety with its large and snowy white flowers with a bright crimson center. Then there is the Stelleta which is a glowing scarlet with contrasting eye of white.

center. Then there is the Stelleta which is a glowing scarlet with contrasting eye of white.

The Petunia is one of the flowers that grow with weedlike vigor. Some of the double varieties are as beautiful as roses. They have lovely curled and fringed edges and are very handsome. Some of the single varieties are daintily striped, but it will not be the fault of the florist if he sells you seeds of the striped variety and the flowers are not thus marked, for the Petunia does not come true from seed.

For a late blooming flower nothing is more satisfactory than the Cosmos. It will be sending forth hundreds of blossoms when Jack and it is a good plan to sow seeds in pots or boxes in the house in boxes in the house in March or April, and thus have well-grown plants to set out by the middle of May. The plants will grow to a height of from four to six feet, and will bear hundreds of white, pink, or red flowers until killed by the severe frost. Light frost will not hurt it if in a sheltered place, but it is well tered place, but it is well to protect the plant if there is danger of frost,

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living paimists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:

Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMPORT PALMISTRY CLUB, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unle-s the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatly, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and vater in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. Dut it is in the same content.

pressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great case must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putly is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

HERE are quite a number of hands to read this month and I will proceed to them at once. "November" wants to know if the two marriages which I foretold in the fall are surely to take place. These may be, or one of them at least, close friendships that come into her life close friendships that come into her life at that time, or some outside influence coming to bear on her life at the time indicated, but these lines are usually read as marriages.

I have often said that I would prefer that you should not have your hands photographed, as a photograph does not bring out the fine lines, and still people keep sending me photographs of hands in spite of my warnings. I have before me a letter of complaint from a young man who says he paid $1.50 to have his hands photographed and still the reading was not good. Since I have repeatedly stated that it is impossible to give a very good reading from a photograph, I do not see how he can blame me. I do not know that he wants to blame for this is what he said: "You did not say anything I did not know and what you did say was not true." I leave it to you if it does not seem as though he knows a great deal that say was not true." I leave it to you if it does not seem as though he knows a great deal that is not true.

"Wonder" sends photographs but she also sends some plaster casts as well which makes it much easier to read the hands. There is nothing better than a plaster cast to read, plaster casts and smoke impressions are what I always ask for and am always glad to get. Wonder has a very good hand showing good common sense, energy, intellectual ability and a good disposition. She has a long life and good health up to the age of 55 or thereabouts when she will need to take great care of herself although I think she will live a long time after. Her fate is exceptionally good showing that she will meet with success in all her ventures alcess in all her ventures although she will meet with some opposition. She will probably not marry until she is 30 or 33 but she will make a brilliant and happy mar-and happy mar-riage at that time. She will, however, outlive her husband and be a widow for years. The latter part of her life will see her in excellent cir-cumstances and her life improves steadily from be-

"WONDER." ginning to end.
All the lines in her hand rise, which is an excellent sign. She will travel a great deal, especially the latter part of her life and I see an element of danger from that fact which will not materialize, however, until late in life. There are no startling changes in her life but a steady improvement from the beginning to the end. She is fond of music and of art, and may excel in one of those branches if she chooses.

"Biography" has sent some smaller paper improvement from the proper improvement from the proper improvement.

"Ricercare" has sent some smoke paper impressions taking care to send several in order that some of them may come through all right. She is a person of emotional tendencies, very upright and straightforward, except that she is inclined to exaggerate things. She sees the truth in a different light from the ordinary human being of a romantic tendency and her enemies will often accuse her of saying things she does not mean. This is because of her natural inclination to exaggerate views. of her natural inclination to exaggerated views and her wonderful imaginative faculties. She and her wonderful imaginative faculties. She has a wonderful degree of imagination, with uncommon originality and a fine power of expressing herself. I would advise her to take up the writing of fiction where she may soon make a great name for herself if she will persevere. She has ample confidence in her own ability, another point in her favor, and while there are several love affairs in her hand, I do not see a marriage, although the lines under the little finger are somewhat blurred. Her nature is such, however, that I think she will remain happier if she keeps single. There is a great future for her as an imaginative writer if she chooses to work for it and I trust that she (CONTINUED ON PAGE 21.)

as well as those about you. There are many people, both men and women, who shrink from the embarrassment of making their diseases public, and on this account go through the world suffering tortures and pain, but through this method you are able to HEAL YOURSELF IN THE PRIVACY OF YOUR OWN HOME, and in a few days you are in the sunshine of health to the surprise of your acquaintances. Many a modest woman suffering untold agony from diseases peculiar to her sex, has gone to a premature grave rather than subject herself to the embarrassment of an examination. The same can be said of men suffering from indiscretions that they were ashamed to confess. This grand method permits sufferers of both sexes to do away with this embarrassment, for by it they cure themselves without the assistance of anyone, of every disease and infirmity. THE BOOK OF HOPE, written by Prof. Murphy, in a plain and concise manner tells you exactly how you can gain this wonderful influence whereby you become proficient in curing disease and bad habits in yourself and in others; develop mental energy, gratify ambition and your every wish: also gives you the key to personal and social successes and teaches you the GRANDEST AND BEST PAYING PROFESSION OF THE AGE, as it is an acknowledged fact that there is no profession known to-day where independence can be so easily gained as through this grand profession. RETIEMBER, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday the realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and address and you will receive this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, rich in all its details, on which neither expense or labor has been spared. It has numerous and elegant illustrations, and is a token which anyone may be proud of. Remember, it costs you nothing, and with it you receive the Agentic Record, a 36-page illustrated magazine. Thousands who have become successful through this mail course, write similar letters to these:

Rev. S. P. Freyberger, Goshen, Ind., writes: "Your course will enable the student to practice the Art of Healing as soon as the course is completed. Having practiced Magnetic Healing for a year past, and having been very successful, I thank you most heartily for the knowledge Ireceived from a study of your mail course." Dr. E. Pritchard, Luling, Texas, writes: "I would not take $500 for your course and do without it. I had catarrh of the head, and also constipation, of several years standing, and have cured myself of both diseases. I have also cured every person I have treated." The neld of Magnetic Healing is as broad as the world itself. It brings wealth, health, happiness and influence.

list of prize winners when you answer this advertisement. The winners in our Feb. 1st contest will be published in the April edition of all the leading publications.

We will give $10,000 in cash to anyone if they can prove that we have not paid the cash prizes to the parties whose names we advertise, or if they can prove that we ever knew cr heard of these parties before they answered our advertisement. We offer this large cash reward in order to convince the public that they will always receive honest treatment

Now if you were so foolish as to overlook all of our previous advertisements, we certainly would advise you not to overlook this one, for we believe you will never have another chance like it the longest day you live.

We want you to read this advertisement over very carefully, and if you think you are dealing with honorable business men, answer it, for it does not cost you one cent. One of these contests is, we believe, a very difficult one, in fact we are quite sure it cannot be solved in a minute or an hour, but it is going to tax your brains and take considerable of your time. It took the President of this Company over six hours to arrange it. However, do not let that deter you from trying, for it can be solved, and just think of the reward. We will give $2000 in cash for the correct answer.

THE block square to the left we have printed twenty jumbled letters which we want you to try and arrange. These jumbled letters, when properly arranged, will spell the names of three cities in the world. One city being located in China, one in the United States and the other in North America. In making the names of these three cities the letters can only be used as many times as they appear and no letter can be used which does not appear. When you have found the three correct names you will have used every letter in the twenty as many times as it appears. Realizing that this puzzle is without a doubt the most difficult one ever advertised, we will give a special prize worth $1$ to those who cannot find the three correct names, but find only one. Remember that if you find only one correct name you will have the same chance of winning one of the big cash prizes mentioned in the second half of this advertisement. If you send in not cost you any money to try, and if you are a successful contestant there is only one easy condition which will take about one hour of your time, and which we will write you about as soon as your answer is received. We would advise you to get out your geography, atlas or encyclopædia, and look for the names of these three cities at once. The correct names are only known to the President of this Company and his private secretary.

The envelope containing the names of these three cities has been sealed and deposited with a leading safe deposit company in Boston, and will not be opened until the day after the contest closes. This, we believe is the only honest way of conducting a contest, as every one will have an equal chance. In the event of more than one correct answer being received we will request five parties who have answered this advertisement to act as a committee to award the cash pro rata. They will be invited to come to Boston at our expense, and be our guests while in this city. We take this original method of ours of selecting a committee to show our good faith, as we want to t

Without Labor or Expense.

E ARE going to give someone who has entered this contest, and who complies with our easy conditions, an opportunity to win and secure from us, without any labor or expense on their part, Two Thousand Dollars in cash. We mean just what we say. If you are the lucky one, and we hope you are, for some one will get it, we will send the winner $2000 in cash. Now, in addition to the cash prize already mentioned we are going to give away a Second Prize of $1000, a Third Prize of $350, a Fourth Prize of $200 and Fifty-eight Cash Prizes of $50 each in the following manner, and that is we will give to one party residing in each State and Territory of the United States and in each Province of the Dominion of Canada a Cash Prize of $50 each. You have an opportunity to win and secure from us without any labor or one cent of expense on your part, any of the above mentioned cash prizes. There is positively no deception, and as for trickery how can there be when the committee is selected from the contestants, and you yourself might be chosen to decide who the winners are. Do not throw this advertisement aside and say, Oh, pshaw, I have answered puzzles before and got nothing for it, for if you do you will regret it as long as you live, someone will win the money and it may be you; no one can tell. Anyway, it does not cost you one cent, as we do not want any money from you. Are the prizes worth trying for? We think they are, for $2000 in cash will be the means of building you either a pretty little home, or establish you in a comfortable paying business. TE ARE going to give someone who has entered this contest, and who complies

Do you know of any firm in the world who have made such liberal offers in such a fair manner? Of course you have no assurance except our word that we are financially able to carry out the promises we make. If you have the least doubt we would be pleased to have you get a special report from either Bradstreet's or Dun's Agencies, our bankers in Boston, or better still, write to the prize winners whose names we publish above. We are a responsible company with a paid up capital of $100,000, composed of well known business men, giving employment to upwards of 160 people, and our sole object in giving away such large cash prizes (something never heard of before) is to advertise our business; and we will leave no stone unturned to accomplish, by honest methods only, our object. Everyone entering this contest will receive honest treatment, and you will have the same chance whether you live in California, Mexico, Canada or Massachusetts; distance positively makes no difference.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

New Hampshire boy, now an officer in the United States Navy, who came home not long ago for a month's visit, told this story of in need. his first experiences as get out o a sailor and of how he where w ran away from his ship to try to cross the con-tinent of West Australia. I tell the story so nearly as I can remember it in the sailor's own words, as he told it to me.
"I was eighteen years old, stout for my age, and I wanted to go to sea. I hired out to ship on a whaler going from New Bedford to Australia, on a three years' voyage. I was hurried off at once. When I reached the ship I was 'advanced' one hundred dollars worth of outfit in what is commonly known as the

on a three years' voyage. I was hurried off at once. When I reached the ship I was 'advanced' one hundred dollars worth of outfit in clothing from what is commonly known as the ship's 'slop chest.' The whole lot would have been dear at $40.

"The voyage to Australia lasted nine months, during which time I did not step on land. Finally we entered King George's Sound, on the southern coast of Australia, on which is situated Albany, the chief seaport of that part of the continent. It was there that I got my first chance to go ashore. I went to the captain for some money, and what do you suppose be gave me? Eight shillings!

"Think of it! Two dollars."

"As a matter of fact it was not the money to celebrate with that I was caring so much for. I had made up my mind long before that to run away the first chance I got. I thought I had had all I wanted of the sea. I knew I would need all the money I could get, in order would need all the money I could get to help me escape.

"Two dollars was all I got, though. That was all the cash I ever got for that nine months' voyage, and all the pay, expect for the clothes out of the 'slop chest' which I have spoken of already.

"One of the other fellows was going with me, and in town we met two other men who were running away, too, so we threw our lots in together, made up a party of four, and skipped, hoping to make our way to some port on the northern coast of Australia from which we could ship back home.

"We knew that as soon as our shore leave existed and the did not return to the ship the northern coast of Australia from which we could ship back home.

"We knew that as soon as our shore leave expired and we did not return to the ship, the police would be notified to watch out for us, seven if the 'black-trackers' were not called out. The latter are natives, the remnant of a force who were trained back in the days when Australia was a convict settlement to run down prisoners who had escaped. They would follow a track as surely as a bloodhound, and more intelligently, since they did not have to depend on secnt alone. Albany was too small a city for us not to be caught there. The only thing for us to do was to strike out from the city.

"How far is it to the next house?' I asked.

"How far is it to the next house?' I asked.

"How far is it to the next house?' I asked.

"How far is it to the next house?' I asked.

"Think of it! There was nothing for me to do, though, and I went on. It was nearly dark.

"Think of it! There was nothing for me to do, though, and I went on. It was nearly at the house. It proved to be quite a large place. The owner himself met me.

"After we had thrown up our job there was only one thing for us to do. We could not go back to Albany, for we would have been arrested at once. The penalty for deserting a ship was three months' imprisonment at hard" nects Albany with Perth and Freemantie, on the northwestern coast, about three hundred and fifty miles away, was being built. Help was searce and in such good demand that we knew if we could reach the construction camps we would have no trouble getting work, and as these camps were then a hundred miles or more inland, be out of the way of the police.

"It has been my experience that almost everybody has a kindly feeling for a sailor when he is so nead in son shore, and helps him when he is get out of the eight out of the city most easily, and also told us how to hunters, a few miles out in the country, who hunters, a few miles out in the country, who who leads the directions of these men, found shelter us for a day or two. We followed the directions of these men, found the morning party, and were taken in by them just as we had been told. Some sheep herders had been told. Some sheep herders helped us out in the same way for another inight. From them we learned that a construction train would start up the line the next morning at three o'clock, carrying men and supplies for the camp. At that time the line had been built about eighty miles from Albany, and the camps were working north of that to meet the other end of the line which was being built down from the morthern terminus.

ours comprised little besides flour, baking powder, tea, and a 'billy-can,' a tin can to make the tea in. The shepherds had showed us how to make 'damper bread,' which campers and outdoor workers depended on almost wholly. This was made by spreading on the ground a piece of stout bagging which appear wholly. This was made by spreading on the ground a piece of stout bagging which every 'swag' contained, and mixing on this cloth flour, baking powder and water to make dough. The lump of dough was coated with clay and put in the embers of a fire in the open air to bake. When it was cooked the clay was brok-en away from the loaf, and the bread was ready to be eaten. It was not so bad as one might think. When we were fortunate enough to get a fowl of any kind it was cooked in the same a fowl of any kind it was cooked in the same way. It was not necessary to take the trouble to pluck the feathers from it. When the clay was broken off it took the feathers with it, leaving the fowl just done to a turn.

"We worked two weeks on the railroad, and then gave in our time and asked for our pay. We were ready to quit. We had found out that there were worse things in life than sailing on board a whaler. The temperature during the day sometimes went as high as 125 degrees, and the dust which filled our throats and nostrils was so dense that we coughed it up in the control of the ready of the control of the ready of the control of the ready of the read lost, and would in time reach the port of Freemantle. We started, taking the trail.

"Our two first days' marches were not bad. Then we struck a desert region where it was, as they say there, 'forty miles from water to water.' That meant that we must start at 4. A. M., and walk until 9 P. M., depending for drink upon water which we carried with us. It is so common to have to carry water in Australia that what are called 'water bags' can be bought almost anywhere. These are canvas bags, holding about three quarts. The canvas does not allow the water to leak through, but it becomes saturated, just enough to keep the water in the bag cool, the same as a wet towel wrapped around a pitcher of water will cool the water in the pitcher.

"Each filled his bag, and we started. The road lay through a basin of clean white sand, glaring in the sun. One of our party drank freely of his water as soon as the sun began to grow hot. We told him not to do this, but he would not mind what we said. The rest of us took only a swallow at a time. As a result of asked my way to the water the very first took only a swallow at a time. As a result of his foolishness we had to nearly carry him the last two hours of the march, and he was half dead at that when we finally pulled into camp. We left him, the next morning, to follow when he could. One of the other fellows hired out to work on a big sheep ranch. That left me with only one companion, and as experience showed me that he was no good I shook him the first chance I got, and went on alone.

"It was not until after I had got started by myself that my money gave out. I had saved it just as carefully as I could, spending it only for food, but finally the last copper went. I had never in all my life asked anybody to give me something to eat, and I had a stiff dislike to coming down to this. I passed one or two coming down to this. I passed one or two places, looked at the houses, hesitated, swal-lowed my hunger and walked on. Finally my stomach conquered, and I said to myself that I would stop at the next house and ask for food. But I walked on and on, and no house came in sight. After a while I met a man on horse-as bold as brass.

"'Oh, come off;' he said. 'I've seen too many of the likes of you before this. Say.' he cried, a moment later, 'I believe you're—' calling me by name.
"'No sir,' I said. 'My name is Smith.'

"'Smith be smithed,' says he. 'Where 'd you get that shirt?'

"With that he grabbed my arm, and swinging me around to where the sun shone full in my face, held me with one hand while he drew

The present tendency to disfranchise the negro by establishing an educational qualification for suffrage, serves as a background to emphasize the success that some men of the colored race achieve. One of the speakers in the great Harvard-Yale debate was Roscoe Conkling Bruce. The annual debate between these two colleges is one of the great literary events of the year. Harvard chose this colored student from the junior class solely for his gifts and capability. He won the Coubertin medal in his freshman year. The medal is offered by Baron Coubertin of Paris, for the best essay on French politics. Three trials are given at Harvard in order to select the debaters for the team. Young Bruce won a prize of $100 for being named at each of these trials. His father was Hon. Blanche K. Bruce, for many years registrar of the United States Treasury. At one time he was Senator from Mississippi. It was at this time when he was generally recognized as a leader of his people that the elder Bruce began his work in the Senate. He was befriended by New York's brilliant Senator, Roscoe Conkling. Young Bruce was named in honor of his father's friend and promises by his oratorical ability to follow his great name-

Philadelphia is occasionally spoken of by irreverent writers as "Bok" land. This is a tribute to the success that Edward William Bok has won as the editor of a woman's paper. The young man is a native of Holland and has among his immediate ancestors the admiralin-chief of the Dutch fleet, a chief justice of the Supreme Court and a minister at the court of William III. In 1869 his family came to America where Mr. Bok received a thorough American public school education in the city of Brooklyn. At the age of thirteen he was obliged to leave school and enter the offices of the Western Union Telegraph Company as an office boy. He learned stenography in the evenings and at the age of nineteen had become editor of a small publication. He was a constant student of literature and at the same time he was developing remarkable executive and business ability. He was connected with two leading New York publishing houses and at the age of twenty-five became editor of The Ladies' Home Journal. A series of articles addressed to young men was so successful that Mr. Bok concluded to give the substance of them from the lecture platform in the form of a lecture called The Keys of Success. He has won an astonishing success in the face of great obstacles. He is fertile in ideas, has limitless patience and indomitable perse-

"Speech is silver, silence is golden." It must have been an admirer of the old proverb who spoke of the golden gift of silence. More and more the variety and excellence of the gift are impressed upon the person who is a martyr to the noise that humanity makes. Tongues and turmoil rob life of more than half its peace and all its serenity. The silence that the proverb refers to is the rarest of all. The constant talker with no appreciation of the value of occasional flashes of silence is the greatest affliction that can be endured. He demands and compels your attention; he wastes your time, patience and nervous energy and he gives no return. The constant talker is never a thinker, so that his babble has no value: his talk is never humorous or witty for if he possessed either of these characteristics he would cease to be a noise maker. Conversation as an magazines and almost hourly newspapers. Comment upon the passing events of the day seems useless when every person of average intelligence is familiar with all the facts. Chief among the sinners of talkers is the person who proceeds to give you the daily news as gleaned from the newspaper and then to illumine the subject by a garbled rehash of the paper's editorial comment. Pages could not enumerate the variety of torture that the constant talker inflicts upon the world-verily, "Silence is golden."

The recently elected House of Commons of England makes a remarkable showing in the number of literary men who have been elected to a seat. Over sixty names are to be found of men prominent in journalism or as writers of history, novels or books on science. Among the best known names are those of Balfour, John Morley, Lecky, James Bryce and Mr. Gilbert Parker, the novelist. Any notable success in literature seems to be an Open Sesame to the franchises of the English people. This may in part be accounted for by the fact that members part be accounted for by the fact that members of parliament do not necessarily reside in the section which they represent. Our custom of choosing only residents of a congressional district while it is not required by the constitution had its origin in a practical idea that a representative could best serve the interests of a familiar constituency. This is wise but it proves a limitation on the number of desirable candidates. In England any man who succeeds in distinguishing himself becomes widely known and in case he has the wish for political life he has as many chances to secure an election as there are seats in parliament. In our country no man whose name came through his literary ability has ever used his celebrity as a stepping stone to a place in the House. Men like Henry Cabot Lodge have been known through their literary work. Some of our diplomats and foreign ministers like Lowell and Hawthorne have won notice through literary success, but the difference from a literary point of view between our House of Commons is wide enough to arrest attention and incite discussion. enough to arrest attention and incite discusenough to arrest attention and incite discussion.

One of the most noticeable features of the year has been the steady advance along the lines of altruistic effort. Libraries, picture galleries, evening schools and free lectures are to be found in the large cities and these advantages are free to the poorest people of the cities. Music in the open air, recreation parks and open air gymnasiums are provided during the summer. While all this interest and care is commendable in the dwellers in cities there has not been a corresponding interest shown in the mental welfare of those who live upon farms or in hundreds of small villages. These people of an intelligence superior to that of thousands of the cities are absolutely cut off from the pleasures and opportunities so freely furnished in cities. Many of these people are dying of intellectual inanition. They never have the opportunity of seeing a really fine picture, of listening to good music or of reading books other than those they feel able to purchase. Art and music may not be easily supplied but good literature can an't should be furnished. A few States have established traveling libraries. In New York they are supplied by the S ate. New Jersey also gives some small State aid in this direction while some of the Western States make a slight provision for traveling libraries. In Pennsylvania they are supported by private contributions and so successful have they been that the contributions and number of libraries have been largely increased during this winter. A demand for libraries from the farmers of any State would result in their general adoption. If some of the men who are giving millions to the endowment of colleges and stationary libraries could be brought to see the needs of the country districts a vast amount of good would be accomplished. A library of fifty volumes located in some central farm house and free to all the neighborhood would accomplish far more than the endowment of a chair in college, If the people demand these libraries they will secure

The question of restricting the suffrage in the United States is developing discussion along one line, while the question of extending suffrage by enfranchising women is exciting no less interest among students of political economy. Our experience as colonies furnishes precedent for both sides of what seems an innovation from the modern point of view. Suffrage had not in Colonial days its present wide general extent to all male inhabitants over twenty-one who are citizens of the United States. The northern or New England states refused the suffrage to those who were not members of the Puritan church, and the Southern colonies made property holding a qualification for voting. At the same time the right to vote on questions relating to taxes was given to unmarried women and widows who were property holders. After the establishment of property holders. After the establishment of the Constitution the tendency was to extend the Constitution the tendency was to extend the privilege of suffrage and the property qual-ifications for voting or office-holding was re-moved, Rhode Island being the last state to abolish it. A few states retained a restriction, Connecticut and Massachusetts having limit-ed the right to vote to those who could read and write. In general, idiots, paupers and lun-atics are excluded and some states exclude those who bet upon election and duelers. The tendency within the last few years has been to provide an educational qualification. This has been more evident in the Southern States and provide an educational qualification. This has been more evident in the Southern States and result in disfranchising the negro and practically evading the spirit of the last three amendments of the Constitution. Side by side with this tendency to limit the suffrage has developed the idea of extending it by omitting the question of sex as a qualification. In four states of our union—Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and Idaho, women enjoy full suffrage, while of the entire forty-eight states and territories only fifteen are without some form of suffrage granted to women. In many states it is limited to school suffrage, in others to municipal suffrage, and in others to county suffrage. The two changes noted show distinct advance in national sense of the qualifications of a voter. The idea that sex should restrict the privilege of the consent of the governed is one that must yield to the advance of modern ideas. When each state shall furnish full, free and adequate means of obtaining an education to every perart seems to be lost in these days of books, means of obtaining an education to every person, an educational qualification should be demanded as a necessary equipment of those who are to select the law-makers, rulers, and judges of the land. The new century will see these changes advanced along the two lines indicated—extension of suffrage gained by removing a sex qualification and limitation of suffrage gained by adding an educational qualification.

school in all its aspects but also with its founder and head, Mr. Booker Washington. He says:

"It seems odd, at first, to think of teaching scholars to make hats and bonnets in school, just the same as they are taught arithmetic and grammar and similar studies, but this is done in a number of schools now. One of these is the famous Pratt Institute in Brooklyn, New York, and another is Tuskegee Industrial Institute for negroes, in Alabama. One of the pictures which I send with this letter shows a young woman who had completed the course of study and whose part in the graduating exercises was to tell how a hat is made, and illustrate her essay as she went along with practical work. The picture shows her as she appeared on the platform at that time. This young woman is now in charge of a large millinery store in the city of Montgomery, Alabama.

"Very many of the young colored women who come to a school like Tuskegee do not know how to sew at all when they come there. They begin in the plain sewing department, on scraps of cloth. The first year they have the simplest kinds of stitches, darning, mending, and such work. They have to take care of their own clothes and they also do the mending for the young men, no small job, when it is remembered that there are seven or eight hundred strong, active young men students at the school each year. After two years in the plain sewing department, girls who have mastered the work are promoted to the dressmaking classes. Three years are spent here if they wish to make dressmaking their trade. If they wish to become milliners, instead of dressmakers, or, as many girls do, wish to combine these two trades, the last year is devoted to millinery, or an additional year taken for instruction in that. In connection with the instruction in trades the girls at Tuskegee also have regular academic instruction. The girls who are studying millinery not only learn to trim bonnets and hats, but they also learn to make the frames before they trim them. They have drawing too, and learn to draw and color original designs. When they first begin to work at trimming they have to use cotton flannel, so as not to waste more valuable material.

Women who suffer with ailments peculiar to their sex, from stooping shoulders, weak back and general ill-health, or lack of strength and vitality, will be interested in the advertisement of The Natural Body Brace in another column. Husbands and friends of such women will be interested in it also. The company's high standing and pleasing business methods are vouched for by the leading banks throughout the country and by many thousands of customers. Satisfaction is guaranteed by the fact that the full purchase price is refunded to any one not pleased after 30 days' trial. The Brace is comfortable and invigorating. It brings light step, graceful figure and good health. It enables a weakly woman to walk, work, ride a wheel or play tennis or golf with ease and pleasure. It is free from all the objectionable features of other supports and treatments. It does away with pessaries. We suggest that you read the advertisement and write at once for free book and full particulars.

HONESTY.

Success in business is not long continued unless honesty is made the keystone of the business arch.

It is possible to impose upon customers in their first purchase, but the dullest of them will soon learn the deception and make their future purchases elsewhere.

The reputation of The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, O., (see advertisement page 23) acquired during 15 years successful business, is the result of honesty and general fair dealing.

It is now the largest and wealthiest firm in the United States dealing exclusively in imported articles for special diseases. The mercantile and financial character of The Von Mohl Co. has never been questioned.

Each one of the above three lines of figures spells the name of a great city in the United States. This is a brand new puzzle and can be solved with a little study, as follows: There are twenty-six letters in the alphabet, and we have used figures in spelling the cities instead of letters. Letter A is number 1, B number 2, C number 3, etc., throughout the entire alphabet. IF YOU CAN SPELL OUT THESE THREE CITIES YOU MAY SHARE IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF $1,000 WHICH WE ARE GIVING AWAY for doing a little work for us. This you can do in less than one hour of your time. This and other most liberal offers are made to introduce one of the very best New York magazines into every home in the United States and Canada. WE DO NOT WANT ONE CENT OF YOUR MONEY. When you have made out the names of these three cities, write them plainly on a postal card and send it to us, and you will hear from us promptly BY RETURN MAIL. It may take an entire evening to solve the three names, but STICK TO IT AND TRY TO GET YOUR SHARE OF THE $1,000. A copy of this high-class ONE DOLLAR MAGAZINE WILL BE SENT FREE to everyone answering this advertisement. Do not delay. Send your answer in immediately. SERVICE STREET, STREET,

CONDUCTED BY AUNT SARAH.

O many requests come for something new in the salad line that we will devote our space this month to salads of the various kinds and the appropriate dressing and garnish to serve with each. While our readers who live in the North may not at present be able to use some of these recipes, on recount of the high prices of fruits and vegetables during the cold season—there are so many readers who live in the South, where fresh vegetables may be had for a moderate price at all times, that we give these recipes now, knowing that later in the season they will also be welcome to our Northern readers.

SPINACH AND EGG SALAD.

Cook spinach and when soft drain and chop fine. Season with salt, pepper and lemon juice and press into a mould. When cold, turn onto a bed of shredded lettuce and around the edge of dish place a ring of the whites of hard boiled eggs cut in slices. In the center of each slice put a spoonful of mayonnaise dressing. Press the yolks through a sieve and sprinkle over the top of the mound of spinach.

CHEESE AND OLIVE SALAD.

Mix together two neufchatel cheeses, one cup young America cheese grated, and six olives, stoned and chopped. Season with salt and paprica, moisten with cream, press and cut into squares. Serve on fresh lettuce leaves and pour over a generous supply of French dressing.

SCALLOF AND TOMATO SALAD.

Clean and parboil one pint scallops; add juice of one lemon, cover and let stand an hour. Drain, dry between towels, season with salt and pepper. Dip each scallop in crumbs, egg and crumbs again, and fry in a basket in deep fat. Cool, cut each scallop in halves, pile in the center of dish and around the edge place slices of tomato. Over all pour French dressing, and around the edge of dish put small sprigs of parsley. parsley.

OYSTER AND GRAPE FRUIT SALAD.
Parboil one pint oysters, drain, cool and remove tough muscles. Remove the pulp from three grape fruits and drain. In removing the pulp, leave the skin in perfect shape, so that the salad may be served in the halves. Mix pulp and oysters and pour over the mixture a dressing made as follows: Mix six tablespoons tomato ketchup, four tablespoons grape fruit juice.

GRAPE FRUIT.

four tablespoons grape fruit juice, one tablespoon Worcestershire sauce, a few drops tabasco sauce and salt to taste. Fill the halves of fruit skins with the mixture, and place in the center a piece of curled celery. Serve on a small plate, on a fringed or embroidered doiley, with a fork, individually. dividually.

CORN SALAD.

Drain one can corn, moisten with French dressing and arrange on a bed of lettuce, chicory or parsley.

SWEETBREAD AND CUCUMBER SALAD. Parboil one pair sweetbreads, cool and cut in small pieces; add an equal quantity of cucumber cut in small cubes, and one-half cup thick cream beaten until stiff; add one-half table-spoon granulated gelatine dissolved in two tablespoons boiling water. Combine mixtures, add salt and paprica to taste, and two tablespoons vinegar. Mould, chill, cut in cubes and serve on a bed of chicory and garnish with TOMATO MAYONNAISE. powdered sugar and a few grains cayenne. Add two egg-yolks and one and one-half teaspoons vinegar. Add gradually one cup olive oil, and as mixture thickens dilute with lemon juice and vinegar, using one tablespoon of each. Add enough tomato ketchup to color.

FRUIT SALAD.

Cut Tangerines in thin slices crosswise; add prunes cooked in wine, Malaga grapes skinned and seeded, and brandied peaches, and put all in a glass dish. Serve cold. Pour over all WINE DRESSING.

Mix one-half cup sugar, one-third cup sherry wine and two tablespoons Madeira.

FRENCH DRESSING. Mix three-fourths teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon paprica, two tablespoons lemon juice

After unt for this long period it is not flatter t no business TO THE GIANT CO., AUG GENTLEMEN: Do you re GENTLEMEN: Do you realize I have been selling your remedies for the past nine years? After acting thus as your agent for this long period it is not flattery when I say to you that no business house exists that can surpass your own in honesty and fair dealings—even more, generosity to its patrons. Not one jar or the slightest cause for complaint is surely evidence beyond question in my nine years' dealings with you. BY EVERETT G. WHEELMAN.

NVENTIVE man has so accustomed us to new and startling objects and wonder fol-lows wonder in such rapid succession that new and startling objects and wonder follows wonder in such rapid succession that we have in a sense become blase from the actual impossibility of "keeping track" of what scientific genius envolves. It was to be expected in the natural order of development, automobilism would not stop until the whole domain of traction and propulsion by artificially generated power should be completely conquered, and the hitherto indispensable animals, such as the horse, mule, ox, donkey and all of that genus, should be relegated to the rear. But as is usually the case, when theory becomes an actuality, the concrete invention was received with a start of surprise.

Everybody is aware of the immense strides made by artificial locomotion in the past two years, but few recall that, while automobilists may now be numbered by thousands and self-propelling vehicles are to be seen on every hand, a very successful automobile omnibus was running in Paris twenty-five years ago. The French have led in the race from the beginning, and the first long road journey for automobiles was that from Paris to Brest in 1891. Three years later a series of auto races was initiated, and in 1896 was formed the Automobile Club, which now contains more than twenty-two hundred members. A recent estimate places the amount of capital employed in the manufacture of automobiles in France alone at more than $2,000,000 and the number of workmen at two hundred and fifty thousand. This country is pressing the Frenchmen hard in the matter of speedy and elegant vehicles, as well as in the aggregate of capital and skilled workmen employed, while England is a close in the matter of speedy and elegant vehicles, as well as in the aggregate of capital and skilled workmen employed, while England is a close third in this production and use of automobiles. The vast number of millionaires and men of leisure in this country has given rise to numerous competitors for the honor of having the greatest number of "chaffeurs" or gentlemen stokers, but so far France can boast the most daring and expert drivers in the world.

There are differences of conjuion as to the relative to the statement of the st most daring and expert drivers in the world.

There are differences of opinion as to the relative merits of the various motor forces employed, and each type, whether of the steam, gasoline, petroleum, liquid air, or electric, has its votaries. For long journeys it is universally conceded that steam or gasoline is preferable, but for territory where the "radius of action" is not large—that is, the distance to be covered does not exceed forty or fifty miles—the electrically propelled vehicle is excellent. For hauling freight long distances over good roads, the French have constructed immense gasoline locomotives of great strength and cost, which the French have constructed immense gasoline locomotives of great strength and cost, which make such an infernal noise that one would think a field of harvesting machines had broken loose. These are excellent for traction, but for speed and immediate availability of power—such as would be required in a fire engine—they have turned to electricity.

The culminating triumph of the electrical fire apparatus came after a long series of experiments and was so convincing that witnesses of the autumn maneuvers before the international congress of scientists at Vincennes were carried away by their enthusiasm, and this equipment has satisfied the Parisian engineer-in-chief so perfectly that he is desirous of radically changing the entire system of the French capital.

It is believed that no further improvement effected almost instantaneously from the trac-tion force to the pneumatic, and conversely. To facilitate rapidity of action the hose, made of rubber, is inclosed in wire, so that it cannot be flattened out, and can always be kept full of water, even when on the reel, as shown in the illustration. The electrical engine proper with illustration. The electrical engine proper, with its personnel of three men, when on the road weighs complete about six thousand five hunweighs complete about six thousand five hundred pounds.

Besides the fire engine proper there is a smaller apparatus which acts as an avant-coureur, being more heavily manned, but slightly, though completely, equipped for instantaneous action. After the pumping engine is on the ground this acts as a feeder and auxiliary. The trio of machines is completed by the electrical ladder truck, which, though it weighs nearly ten thousand pounds, is more easily managed and more rapid than the old kind drawn by animals and turns corners with greater facility. The extension ladders are borne on a sort of ramp, or movable stairway, hoisted by wheel and winch and carried when en route in nearly a horizontal position.

noisted by wheel and winch and carried when en route in nearly a horizontal position.

Doubtless I shall be asked for an address where these machines can be tested. I presume any of the leading Automobile Companies or Bicycle manufacturers can give any needed information but those who are not satisfied can be so by addressing "PEtat Major des Pompiers, Paris, France."

Diers, Paris, France."

One of the interesting exhibits at a recent automobile show is one of the first steam carriages that was ever built. It was made in 1860 by Richard Dudgeon and is now owned by Frank P. Dudgeon. The machine is run by a steam engine that is fed from a boiler that is heated by a coal furnace. Since it was constructed the machine has run more than 40,000 miles and it is still in good condition.

The recent statement of a prominent physician that long distance bicycle riding is in-power also works the pumps, the change being | Germany fourth with 434; Great Britian fifth, 412, and Austria sixth with 403. France has 702 manufacturers and 1150 dealers, while this country has 190 manufacturers.

the Spanish war which has attracted more popular interest than the bringing of twelve hundred Cuban teachers to Boston for a course of instruction in English. Many are the stories which are told about the things which these Cuban teachers did which seemed strange at first to their American hosts, and then not strange when the reasons of the Cubans for their actions were understood. On the other hand many of our actions must have seemed just as incomprehensible to the visitors. The commingling of the two races has been a mutual education. The Cuban visitors have learned English. We have learned Spanish. They have learned our ways, and we have learned theirs. "Another way in which much is being done for the American education of the Cubans is by bringing here Cuban students, often mere children, who will by and by go back home to teach American ways. I have been interested recently in watching a company of such students at Tuskegee. There are now a dozen or fifteen such students there. Some have been there nearly two years. I send with this a photograph of a group of Cubans who have been at Tuskegee a year. When they came only one could speak any English. Before a year had passed they all could speak fairly, well enough to make themselves understood, although among themselves they often still prefer to speak Spanish. In addition to learning English all are at work in the industrial classes of the school, learning some trade. One is in the machine shop, one is a painter, two are in the carpenter shop, etc. The young woman is learning dress-making and millinery. The progress of these students has been so encouraging that Governor-General L. A. Wood has recently sent over three more Cuban boys to the same school."

"One of the most beautiful arches in the world is that which seemingly divides the sea from the land at San Francisco. It stands just beyond the reach of the ever restless waves at the ocean entrance to Golden Gate Park, and spans the broad avenue which runs out on to the narrow boulevard that follows the shore. Composed of dark, heavy slabs of rock it rises with massive distinctness against the background of bright blue sea and broad, white ocean beach. At its base creep and twine fragile and fragrant blooming vines, while here and there agaves find sheltered nooks from which to throw out their long, shining leaves. These Mexican plants lend a foreign aspect to the arch, which, with the wealth of semi-tropical shrubbery of the park behind it, the rich blue sky above and the far ocean before it is set amid such deep and vari-colored surroundings that it seems to belong more to the seclusion and quietude of some southern forest than at an entrance way to one of the greatest cities in the world. Countless numbers daily enjoy its suggestive beauty, but it is seen at its best at sunset or when the moon is drifting down among the far distant, lifting waves; for the last light of either of these two great planets shines upon it and brings out with a softened effect all its sombre symmetry.

"But a short distance before the arch come and go the many vessels setting out for or returning from the southern ports, while one of the first sights to greet the eyes of home coming soldiers and travelers from our far southern islands and the Orient is this familiar landmark which can be discerned far out at sea. Yet standing here as it does upon the imposing, mountainous shores of so immense a sheet of water, fashioned as powerfully as the hands of man can build, it ever reminds one of the feebleness of struggling man as compared with the mighty, unseen power of the ruler of the universe."

MAUD B. RODGERS, San Francisco, Cal. Now we have a bit of Cincinnati's ancient history. "Standing on a hill opposite beautiful Burnet Woods, is a little log cabin which is the oldest house in Hamilton County, Ohio. The main part of the house was built in 1780, but the man who commenced the cabin never finished it, and it was never known whether he was killed by the Indians or went farther west.

or went farther west.

"The front windows face Clifton, one of Cincinnatis most beautiful suburbs; its tree clad hills, once the abiding place of the red man, are now crowned with magnificent homes, and the little log cabin, with its rough structure and brick fire places, is the only remaining trace of the early days of Cincinnati.

"Andrew Cox, born in Germany, in 1761, came to Cincinnati, then in its infancy, with his wife, Rebecca, in 1795. They came down the Ohio river in flatboats, and landing at the primitive settlement decided to remain and took possession of the unfinished cabin. Mr. Cox, who had fought in the Revolution under Hull, and who came from a sturdy German stock, refused to listen to his neighbor's warnings concerning the Indians and set up his lares and penates. When he plowed his ground he found the bones of a human being, which seemed unusually large, and some utensils of Indian workmanship. He concluded that his farm had been the burying-place of some tribe many years before, and he searched diligently for more proof, but never found any. However, he never had any trouble with Indians. His daughter Margaret married Edward De Serisy, who was Lieutenant under Bonaparte, and after Mr. Cox's death Margaret and her husband lived for several years in the cabin, which has, until now, been left standing as a landmark, but it is soon to be torn down to make way for modern buildings."

"Imagine running right into a tiger's open jaws every Sunday! Yet that is just what the Hindoos near Cuttach, in India, used to do whenever they went to worship. To be sure, the tiger's jaws were of stone, but it was decidedly a sensational proceeding, nevertheless. A tiger's maw is about the last form we should think of giving to a church, but by these people it was evidently regarded as highly appropriate. One does not wonder so much when he investigates their religion, for the gods they worshiped were for the most part no better than flends; so it may have seemed quite natural to go 'into the jaws of hell' to pay them homage.

"The Tiger Temple is hewn out of a great mass of rock, projecting from a ledge. Probably nature gave it some resemblance to a tiger's head, but the clever stone workers carved and shaped it until the likeness is something startling. A tiger of the ordinary size is bad enough, but here one as big as ten elephants, crouched and ready to spring, seems to be poking his ugly nose out from under the overhanging rocks. The upper jaw and teeth make a sort of portico; the arch over the doorway suggests the tongue, and the opening itself the aperture of the throat. Through this you apparently pass into the creature's maw, but find yourself in a small, dark chamber which once contained a hideous idol of some sort. It is only to be,hoped that human sacrifices were not offered to appease its wrath in this gruesome den.

"Just as Egypt is full of rock-hewn tombs, so is India full of these cavern sanctuaries, not all patterned after the beasts of the jungle, but almost invariably grotesque in the extreme; for it is a curious fact that everything pertaining to these cruel gods is made as monstrous and repulsive as is their own nature. The Hindoo Pantheon is like a congress of demons holding high carnival. Such a religion must inevitably make its followers cruel and vindictive, and it is noticeable that the carvings on these strange temples always represent somebody ruthlessly treading someone else into the mire.

The fierce sun of the tropics renders their interiors hot and stifling almost beyond endurance, and they form an ambush of deadly fever germs. Besides, fierce and poisonous serpents find them a desirable lurking place; and even bears, panthers, and tigers make their dens within them, and after passing the frightful portals you run great risk of being clutched in the terrible claws of some ferocious wild beast lurking in the gloomy recesses within." THE SNAKE CHARMER has no influence on this jolly musical novelty. You blow it up and see it slowly expand. It is a regular Rubber neck, for it stretches out to see like a peninsular, and what heaps of fun you can have with it. Let a friend take hold of it and feel it squirm, then see your friend squirm when it begins to hiss and hiss and double up rubber around. They create more sport in a crowd than you can imagine and everybody wants one just to have some sport with their neighbors. Don't miss it; you will laugh and grow fat over the sport it will make. They sell quick at Fairs and on the street. Send 16c ents for a four months' trial subscription to our great home monthly and we will send you one FREEL. Send 16c, you get two, 25c. for four, 50c. for one dozen. You make big profits; we pay postage.

Well, dear Cousins, how have you been doing for the last month? The months are all alike, dears, it is only you that can be better or worse. But why moralize? Let the glad sun shine and let us all do the very best we can. That will make it all right. Now to the work before us.

That will make it all right. Now to the work before us.

The first in the list is Cousin Blanche of Florence, Neb., and she wants to know if it is correct to tell a friend who has faise teeth that she knows they are false. That's a funny question. As a rule such things are not discussed; at the same time false teeth are so common and so necessary that their possession is hardly a secret, but still don't mention it if the person is sensitive.

Jolly Chums, Hampton, Iowa.—Champagne is said to be a harmless wash for the hair to make it lighter. (2) If the physician doesn't know how to cure your red nose, I am sure I don't. (3) It is more difficult for one who plays by ear to become a fine musician than one who does not, simply because it comes so much easier and the person will not apply herself as she should. (4) Tell the young man plainly you do not care for his attentions. (5) Young men may and do go with girls for much longer than a year without declaring their intentions. Getting married is not the sole object of friendly association.

Beryl, Rose Hill, Texas.—I can't tell you how to make a living. If you can do anything, do it; that's how we do who make our living. (2) Decline to dance with the young man and tell him why.

Ithelma, Brookside, Col.—Write to any of the music or book publishers advertising in Comfort.

music or book publishers advertising in Comfort.

Lottie B., Crescent, Wash.—The gentleman should not put his arm around the lady until he's engaged to her. (2) I do not know what you mean. (3) If the doctors have failed to benefit you I would not like to undertake a cure. You will find a remedy advertised in Comfort. Try it.

Pansy, Dublin, Ohio.—You don't know what to say when a young man tells you he loves you? I'm sure if the young man thought you were that silly he never would have told you. (2) A year of courtship is not too long. (3) It is quite "proper" for a young man to lie down and go to sleep while courting his "best girl," if she can not entertain him sufficiently to keep him awake. (4) A solitaire diamond is the proper engagement ring. (5) Never kiss a young man good by when he is going away for only six months—unless you are engaged to him.

Coon's Eyes, Echo Valley, Col.—Certainly when you are selling an article as an agent you may ask your men friends to buy. (2) You can cut your curls as you please, I should think. There is no especial style for wearing the hair among school firls.

Mayflower, Spink, S. D.—Consult the seed and flower advertisements in Comport and write for the information you want. (2) Fifteen-year-old girls should wear their dresses to their shoe tops.

M. A. G., Bradford, Mass.—The young man ought to be able to put his overcoat on without your beip. If he isn't; help him. (2) Girls and boys are of legal age at twenty-one. (3) Girls of seventeen to walking and to places of amusement with young men, but they should do very little of it, and only with those they know very well. (4) Girls should not receive men callers before they are eighteen, and only then in moderation. You will become passe soon enough.

Lily, Cincinnati, O.—Don't try to bring the young man to terms. Be as nice to him as you can, but let him do the courting. If he wants you he will let you know; and if he does not, the more you try to get him, the more humiliated you will feel in the end.

Mayflower, Madison, Pa.—If the young man calls at lunch time, it is proper to give him some. Ordinarily, light refreshments may be handed around. (2) Ask your mother all the other questions you ask me.

Sunflower, Monroe, Neb.—Thank the Lord you have escaped marriage with such a silly fellow, and treat him and his family just as you would ordinary acquaintances. acquaintances.

M. C. R., Willow Ranche, Cal.—Write to any baker or caterer in the city nearest to you. (2) Paper napkins will hardly do at a wedding breakfast or dinner. (3) The bride may make the groom a present if she wishes, but I don't think it is customary. customary.

Cactus Blossom, Tucson, Ariz.—A toilet case makes a very nice present, and is quite appropriate. (2) I can give no advice to a "jealous hearted" person. That sort is incurable and everlastingly a thorn in his own flesh and everybody's else.

F. N., Warrenton, Va .- Of the two young men you and better take the one you can get.

Innocence, Meetze, Va.—Certainly "school girls can love as well as old maids," but all of them can't spell as well, and suppose, before you fall too desperately in love, you devote yourself to your school duties—anyhow till you learn to spell.

A Friend, Krugersdorp, Ills.—When a girl doesn't know which of two men she loves more, she doesn't really love either. You had better drop them both.

shine, not too much; proper eating and careful massage ought to effect the result.

Winnie, Jacquet River, Restigouche.—Send the lady a wedding present.

Brown Eyes, New Castle, Ind.—It is quite proper to correspond with your brother-in-law's brother. One "gentleman correspondent," is quite enough for a fifteen-year-old girl.

V. E. R., Northeast, Pa.—Edelweiss is pronounced very nearly as if spelled A-del-vice, with the accent on the first syllable.

M. K. H., Hebron, Ark.—The husband ought to be from five to fifteen years older than the wife.

Viola, Winnepeg, Man.—The lady should not move her glove when shaking hands, nor sho the man, unless he has on heavy driving gloves.

Ellisa, Necurd, Minn.—Don't have anything to do with the kissing young man. You will have no trouble in finding a better one. (2) Don't be too quiet and don't be too full of jokes. Be cheery and good natured.

Lizzie W., Cincinnati, O.—It is not known why St. Valentine was called the patron saint of lovers, as nothing in his life would seem to warrant it.

Inferior Friend, Springfield, Ills.—It is quite natural you should love so admirable a man. Some day he may understand, but until he does you must wait and hope. That he loves you will bring it around all right.

Babe, Leeds, Utah.—Your parents can send fou East to school if they want to. (2) Yes, arsenic is injurious for the complexion. (3) Send the youth a valentine if you wish. (4) Of course he should assist you in removing your cape. (5) Nothing can well take the place of napkins at the table. (6) Nineteen-year-old girls don't wear their dresses as high as their shoe tops. (7) Unless you are engaged to the young man you cannot claim his entire attention.

S. B. T. Et. Wingste N. M.—"Glad to meet you."

S. B. T., Ft. Wingate, N. M.—"Glad to meet you" is good enough to say upon introduction. As there are no set forms of greeting you must judge for yourself what to say on such occasions.

Virginia Bred, Charlottesville, Va.—I know of no musical school where you can get tuition for your work. Ask some of your town music teachers, or the music teacher at the University, if there is one.

work. Ask some of your town music teachers, or the music teacher at the University, if there is one. Two Girls, Kennett Square, Pa.—No, a girl should not "go out with other fellows when her main gentleman friend is at college". My, my, why do you say "main gentleman friend"? (2) People of different religious denominations who marry must decide between themselves who is to turn. (3) A letter should be answered within two weeks. (4) If the gentleman is to blame he is the one to apologize. (5) Four persons may ride in one buggy if the walking is impossible. (6) Young ladies should walk to entertainments if within easy walking distance and they are not in full evening dress, and the weather is fair.

A. A., Saratoga, N. Y.—Your aunt did right in scolding you for sitting on the stairs in the dark with a young man. A girl of twenty ought to know, and I am sure you do, that such conduct is not ladylike. A thoughtless girl might do so once, but a nice girl would not do so a second time.

Unfelix, Hamilton, Texas.—Meet the young fellow in a friendly way, that is all. (2) For flabby skin use one part whiskey to one part milk, applying every eight days with a soft towel, washing the face. It is slow but sure. (3) Ask about the clothes when you are ready for them. is the order of the day. The Empire Mustache is the latest fad out. You show your friend the fine growth of nice black hair on your lip and say, "How do you like the looks of it?" then while she or he is intently examining it you quietly inflate the thing by a simple, easy breath and—Great Scott! Expansion—why you can't keep a straight face when you see the startled look come into your friend's face, for this funny mustache just expands and stretches out way across your face and nearly a foot beyond, then back it comes into position and away it goes again. Thus back and forth it plays to the mystification of the observer and delight of the wearer. The device that works it is so easy and simple that you wonder why it was not invented before. They are the greatest marvel now on the market.

will accept this as her mission in life. She will have some opposition and some obstacles to her intellectual career but if she will persevere she has it in her to accomplish great things.

"Rose" asks a great many questions which would indicate that it would be well for her to procure an elementary book on Palmistry and study it. I can only take the space here to answer questions which are not treated in the most elementary books on the subject.

If the head line is marked by a cross and a break anywhere, it would mean some very serious affection of the brain or perhaps death. If the line, however, is re-enforced by another one under or above in such a way as to strengthen it the trouble may be averted.

Branches from the head line to the life line may mean several things according to the interpretation of the rest of the hand; usually, however, they mean some obstacles to the life which affect the brain or intellect unpleasantly. A branch of the life line going up onto the Mount of Jupiter is a good sign, signifying the realized ambition.

Several questions have been asked about the Mount of Apollo which is situated directly under the third finger.

If the Mount is developed to excess it indicates a love of wealth and of extravagance in expendit ure, inates a love of wealth and of extravagance in expenditure, instincts of luxury, fatuity, envy and curiosity, a quick, unreasonable temper and settong per, and a strong tendency to levity, frivolity, and soph-istry. Such sub-jects are boastful, vain, think them-selves unappreci-ated, but highly ated, but highly superior to their fellow-men; this excessive, development is generally accompanied, and is emphasized by, twisted fingers, spatulated soft hands, a grille on spatulated soft hands, a grille on the mount, with a long phalanx of will and proportionately short phalanx of logic.

If, on the other hand, this mount is absent in both hands, its absence betrays materiality and indifference to matters artistic, giving a dull, unenlightened life.

A single line deeply traced upon the mount indicates fortune and glory; two lines indicate considerable talent, but a great probability of failure, whilst many confused lines show a tendency to lean to the scientific aspect of art.

If the mount is merely developed, having no

If the mount is merely developed, having no line marked upon it, it shows a love of the beautiful, but not necessarily a talent for production of works of art.

A spot upon the mount denotes a great danger of a loss of reputation or caste.

When in a hand the Mounts of Apollo and of Mercury are found equally developed, we find a character in which justice, firmness, perspicacity, love of scientific research, combined with clearness of diction and eloquence, are salient features. The combination of Apollo and the Moon gives good sense, imagination, reflection, and lightheartedness. With an equal development of the Mount of Venus, we get amiability and a great desire to please. and a great desire to please.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE Speculum for the Lunation or New Moon this month, which occurs at about a quarter before 8 o'clock in the morning of the 20th of March, 1901, Wash in gt on Time, is rather an important one, as it occurs so near to the time of the Ingressor birth of the new Astrological year. The 8th degree of Taurus will be rising and the 23rd degree of Capricorn will be culminationand will be nearly in conjunction with the great benefic Jupiter. Herschel will be in the 8th house while Mars will stand in Leo, in the 5th house, retrograde. The lunation falls in the 12th house and Venus and Mercury will be in the 11th.

The indications of the figure are in the main good. Venus, ruler of the scheme, stands in benevolent aspect with Saturn, who is ruler of the Midheaven, showing harmony and satisfaction between the people of the country and the constituted rulers. Mercury in the 11th house, ruler of the Nation's treasury, has the powerful rays of benevolent Jupiter and in harmony with Venus, ruler of the people. This indicates legislation by Congress for the best interests of our people in a financial sense though the square of Herschel points to some unusual interference and criticism of the course of the administration by eccentric or erratic individuals.

The progress of the Nation continues steadily onward among the powers of the world. Our foreign commercial interests are broadened; the merchant marine is encouraged in growth and our importance among nations receives constantly increasing recognition. The four great planets Neptune, Herschel, Saturn and Jupiter will be nearly together, high in declination this year and we may reasonably look for some unusual atmospheric and earth disturbances, probably some marked earth tremors, tidal disturbances and electrical phenomena in various regions of the earth. Herschel in the 8th indicates sudden death among our public men where least expected. Mars in the 5th, retrograde, in the fiery Leo leads to the apprehension of some bad catastrophe to a hotel, theater, or school by fire in

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR APRIL, 1901.

APRIL. 1—Monday. Give attention to routine matters principally on this day, and particularly such as have relation to houses and lands or their products or improvement; but do not make any beginning of consequence even in these matters; avoid any contract-making, nor should dealings be had with public officers or corporate authorities; beware of any deal concerned with patents, copyrights, trade-marks or novelty wares; do not travel or solicit favor from state or municipal authorities; literary affairs do not meet success and those engaged on the public press will not find favor from general readers.

2—Tuesday. Beware of making any extensive pur-

Trom general readers.

2—Tuesday. Beware of making any extensive purchases of merchandise or entering upon any new financial enterprise on this or the following day; goods in trade purchased at this time are likely to constitute a large part of what is known as "shop worn stock" or hang heavy on the hands; this is especially true of all the classes of fancy or artistic goods or such as gratify or amuse.

part of what is known as "snop worn stock" or naigheavy on the hands; this is especially true of all the classes of fancy or artistic goods or such as gratify or amuse.

2—Wednesday. Have no transactions with banks or other monied institutions on this day; buy only those things which are indispensable, and as few as possible of those; and do not look for increase of wages or promotion in thine employment; avoid all dealings pertaining to real estate; shun the broker, landlord, agriculturalist and all purchases of farm or mine products or building materials. This is an extremely unfortunate birthday anniversary and cautions all claiming it to be more than ordinarily watchful of any venture offering; let them act conservatively in all their affairs, not venturing any spare capital in new enterprises and watching all the corners in their established business, iest bad leakages and losses come at this period. This is also true of persons born in the first few days of January, July, or October, of past years; and such persons equally with those claiming this day, should safeguard the health and be prudent in their affairs for some time to come; marriageable ladies, so born, had better avoid any matrimonial alliance at this time if they would consult their future happiness and prosperity; many ladies, so born, who have already taken steps towards matrimony, will find themselves disappointed from broken pledges or through the serious misfortunes of their intended partners; married ladies, so born, are likely now to be having unpleasant experiences with their husbands or in sharing the misfortunes that fall to the lot of those near or dear to them; they will need to exercise patience, extend sympathy and show their courage in assisting their male relatives at the present/uncture in their affairs. To all these persons the passing time is a trying one, yet they should not be discouraged at disappointments which are only temporary, for the clouds will soon roll away and disclose the bright sunshine beyond.

4—Thursday. Th

6—Saturday. Quite a favorable day for the general affairs of life, though not for making commencement of any new venture of magnitude; give attention to minor or routine transactions connected with accounts, collections, literary work and mental efforts; the evening is best for correspondence and mathematical labors.

best for correspondence and mathematical labors.

7—Sunday. An unfavorable Sabbath day, in which crosses and unpleasantness are likely in clerical affairs; males born about the dates indicated in the 3rd paragraph should see to it in these passing weeks that business ruptures and changes do not come from acts of theirs and should not at this time begin important undertakings but be satisfied with their present lot rather than seek now to improve it by new ventures.

S-Monday. Choose this day for urging thy labors in the elegant and artistic walks, for musical efforts, painting, decorating and the fine arts generally, though caution is urged against extravagance in expenditures for such purposes; be slow to follow the impulses towards intemperate gratifications of either taste or appetite.

9-Tuesday. Improve the middle hours of the day for all ingenious and mechanical trades and avocations and especially for chemical experiments and processes; the noon time invites caution in literary matters when

10—Wednesday. The day is indifferent, though the afternoon will be likely to quicken the temper and promote disputes; have care in this respect.

11—Thursday. The early forenoon should be given every preference for all honorable transactions; make no engagements towards wedlock nor expect any success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares. REGULUS especially advises the fair not to let wealth tempt them to wed in these passing days, especially where there is much disparity of years, for disappointment and unhappiness are likely to fall to their lot particularly if their birthday anniversaries fall about the 5th of January, 3rd of April or the 8th of October, of past years.

12—Friday. Begin this day early and urge thy several pursuits vigorously during the forenoon when all engaged in literary and scientific pursuits and especially in legal, judicial and ecclesiatical affairs, should be particularly active; prosecute mathematical studies, sign deeds, execute writings and do important correspondence; urge sales of fancy goods and fine wares.

18 — Thursday. Choose the forenoon hours for dealings with those employed in matters pertaining to amusements, wearing apparel and house furnishings or decorations; engage with thy tailor, dressmaker, or milliner, and do all things requiring the exercise of special taste; let the musician and artist improve the moments of this day to the utmost, buy fancy goods and fine wares for trade. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday, the tender sentiments are likely to be pleasantly enlisted and agreeable advances in courtship or more enjoyable marital or social experiences come in these passing weeks. The forenoon of the day offers better than ordinary promises of prosperity and happiness to those them marrying; unless, indeed, the nativities of the parties are radically opposed; urge thy suit with the fair sex and seek healthful recreation and pleasure from the dramatic, musical, artistic or social entertainment.

19—Friday. Drive thy business vigorously on this day; have money dealings and trade in real estate, boots and shoes, wool, lead, coal, and all classes of building materials.

CALTHOS"

Prof. Laborde's Marvelous French Cure for Lost Manhood.

FIVE DAYS' TRIAL TREATMENT Sent Absolutely Free by Sealed Mail To All Sufferers.

NO C. O. D. OR DEPOSIT SCHEME.

The only preparation known to science which really cures Lost Manhood is "CALTHOS," the marvelous French remedy discovered by Prof. Jules Laborde. It is controlled in this country by The Von Mohl Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern which occupies a high and honorable place in the world of medicine. It is one of the largest and most responsible houses in Cincinnati, as anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all means of the control of t anyone who is acquainted in that city will testify.

The Von Mohl Company invites all men suffering from Lost Manhood, Spermatorrhœa, Varicocele, Small Parts or Weakness of any nature in the Nerves or Sexual Organs, to send their names and receive a five days' treatment. This will prove the wonderful vitalizing powers of "CALTHOS." After using it five days the sufferers will find new vigor in their organs, new force in their muscles, new blood in their veins, new ambition, and rapid progress toward the buoyant feelings and sensations of younger days.

This liberal free offer is genuing. There is no swind.

This liberal free offer is genuine. There is no swindling C.O.D. or Deposit Scheme connected with it. The five days' treatment is sent by sealed mail to all on request, wrapped in a plain package, and full printed instructions accompany the medicine, so that each patient becomes his own doctor and cures himself at home.

It doesn't make any difference what caused the weak-mess-whether bad habits in youth, or excess, or over-work, or business troubles. "CALTHOS" will effect a cure, no matter what big name the disease may be called by doctors. by doctors.

The Von Mohl Company treats all correspondence in perfect confidence. Under no conditions will it make public the names of the thousands who have written testimonials telling of their restoration to robust manhood after other medicines and appliances have proved worthless. "CALTHOS" is regularly used in the French and German armies, and the soldiers in those countries have come to be perfect models of strength and vitality. Cures are effected at all ages from twenty to eighty years. There is no case (except where the stage of epilepsy or insanity has been reached) which it will not radically, quickly and permanently cure. Sexual weakness does not cure itself. It grows worse from week to week. Each day aggravates the mental and physical anguish.

Send today for the free five days' trial treatment. If it helps you, more of the medicine can be purchased. If it does not nelp, no harm is done and no money has been paid out. You can send your name in the full knowledge that it will be kept from all. The "CALTHOS" department of our business is strictly confidential. Address applications for trial treatment, etc., to

Tells What All Things Cost

We publish a book that gives wholesale prices on 70,000 things. It contains 1,200 pages filled with accurate descriptions, and 17,000 pictures. It tells about what your dealer pays for everything. It enables you to buy as low as he. It offers you a saving of from 15 to 50 per cent on practically everything that men or women buy. It tells you the least that anything can cost; and there is scarcely a family that cannot save at least $100 per year by it. We want to send you this book as we have to more than a million others. to send you this book, as we have to more than a million others.

FACTS ABOUT THIS BUSINESS

Established 29 years ago. We are the originators of the catalogue business.

Ours is the largest mail order house in the world—larger than all others in the United States combined.

Value of merchandise carried, $2,500,000.

Floor space occupied, 25 acres. Average shipments, 13,000 daily. Clerks employed, 2,000. Typewriters in use, 100. The building which we own and occupy is the tallest mercantile building in the world.

Our whole business is done by mail, through our catalogue at wholesale prices. We receive from 15,000 to 35,000 letters and orders daily.

OUR GUARANTEE

We guarantee safe delivery of goods.

We guarantee that everything bought from us will be satisfactory. Others may warrant things to be "as represented." Remember we guarantee that you will be satisfied and pleased. If not, then return what you get, at our expense, and we'll exchange it. Or, we will return your money, including what you paid for freight. Our guarantee is backed by millions of dollars. It makes satisfaction sure. You can trade with us by mail as safely as with your dealer in person. If you find that your order isn't just what you want, you can get something else or your money back.

LOWEST WHOLESALE PRICES

You will want to know how we can quote these prices. How can we sell to you at about what your dealer pays?

Because we buy as much as two thousand average stores combined. Think what it costs to send salesmen to 2,000 separate dealers! We save all that, and more. Competition for our trade compels makers to sell to us close to cost.

And we have factories of our own where we make things that we cannot buy low enough.

We save enough in our buying — under your dealer's cost — to pay our expenses and profit.

If our profits were as great as those of others our prices would be impossible. It would require thousands of salespeople to sell in person what we sell by mail. We save their cost and most of a dealer's expenses.

Those are the savings which make our prices possible.

This is the modern and economical method of buying and selling.

More and more people, living away from big cities, are supplying their wants by mail You will eventually join with the millions who buy at our prices and save what we save; for dealers can never compete with us. But we want you to deal with us now.

When you have from us once you will regret the years you have waited

When you buy from us once you will regret the years you have waited. You will open a way to save thousands of dollars in the years to come. Won't you send today for our catalogue and begin the saving now?

SEND 15 CENTS TODAY

If you want our catalogue, fill out carefully the slip to the right of this, and mail it to us today, enclosing 15 cents. This catalogue which we offer you costs us about 50 cents to print, even in million lots. The postage on it costs us 32 cents more. We ask you to send us but 15 cents (less than half the postage alone) just to show that you do not send from mere curiosity.

This book will save any average family at least $100 per year. If you don't find that it will save you at least a hundred times what it costs you, simply write us and we will cheerfully send your 15 cents back.

HY, Bob Davis! Don't you know that's nothin' but a fairy tale? There never was any such a mine, an' so of course you can't find it. What's gone wrong with your head that you, of all men, should be goin' on such a rainbowchase as this?" "You don't know everything, Dan," Davis returned, chuckling at the astonishment showing in his partner's face; "there's more in that yarn than you think for, an' I'm goin' to find out just what it amounts to. It won't cost much to run down an' look the country over, an' if there ever was such a mine, I'll find it; you can gamble on what led those old Dons to it 'll carry me to it. Of course, if I find it's nothin' but a rainbow, I'll just drop it an' come back home."

"All right, go ahead, I knew it wouldn't do any good for me to say a word," Dan replied, dryly. "You ain't the only fool to go up against those Mexican lies, an' that's about all the satisfaction you 'll get out it. I know, for I've been there myself." And he took up some papers that were lying before him on his desk.

The mine of which they were speaking was El Tablon, one of the lost Spanish mines of New Mexico. These mines had much to do with the making of the early history of New Mexico. When the Spaniards discovered the valley of the Rio Grande, they found it occupied v a docile, peace-loving people, the Indians called Pueblo; and when they discovered that the mountains flanking the valley were rich in silver, they enslaved these Indians to work the mines that were speedily opened. A silver flood that astounded the world was the result. but at what a cost of misery, of suffering, of life, it was produced, the world knew nothing. For a hundred years the helpless Pueblos patiently bore their lot, and then suddenly rose in rebellion, massacring the most of the Spaniards, and sweeping the rest back into Mexico. Having in mind their enforced adoption of the Christian religion, and their suffering in the mines, they next turned their fury against these; they destroyed the churches and monastaries, and with them all their books and records; and they hid the mines, filling them with rock and earth, or covering them over, and obliterating or carrying far away everything that might have led to their rediscovery. To prevent the betrayal of their secret, the old medicine-men now invoked the aid of their gods, and their chief deity, speaking through the lips of his cratty priests, laid a curse of death and perpetual exclusion from Shipupalima, the Pueblo heaven, upon whom-abouts of the mines. Many years passed, and then the Spaniards returned, again conquering the Pueblos, but it was to discover that the mines could not be found, and that neither torture nor death would serve to wring the secret of their location from Pueblo lips. And so the Spaniards lost them, but their memory is still preserved by the simple New Mexicans and that had inspired Davis with the hope that he might find El Tablon, which was accounted the richest mine of them all.

And Davis was just the man to succeed in such an undertaking; shrewd, persevering, and seldom taking chances when the odds were against him, he had accumulated considerable money in the mining business, a business which has brought ruin to thousands of other men. As with all other successful men, there were a few who looked with envious eyes upon his success, and these were won't to hint myst riously at dark, unscrupulous deeds in his past; but to the majority of those who daily frequented the Denver Mining Exchange, he was known as a good business man who did nothing more dishonest than to do business in a business-like way.

Heedless of Dan's prophecy of failure, he went to New Mexico and quietly established himself in Los Gatos, a sleepy little Pueblo, near which the tradition located El Tablon, and as quietly began a careful examination of the hills and mountains around about. He was a skillful prospector and practical geologist; nevertheless, so well had the Indians done their work he searched in vain, finding neither the mine nor indications that might lead him to it; but he did discover evidence that it was not mythical, bits of slag from a primitive smelter, and pieces of rich ore, and so he kept up his search. Tramping alone day after day gave him opportunity for a deal of hard thinking, and he finally reached the conclusion that, while the natives might be unable to find the mine themselves, they must have received from their ancestors knowledge of it that he could turn to good account; and he set himself the task of learning all that they knew concerning

He told Dan of this in his next letter, to which Dan answered, "Don't be too sure of pumping your greasers; they're mighty smooth people themselves, and I'm thinking you'll get nothing more than a song-and-dance-or maybe a knife stuck in your gizzard. You'd better let them alone; I know the breed."

And Dan was right; the people of Los Gatos, like other New Mexicans, were of mixed Spanish and Pueblo blood, and, as a deal of Pueblo superstition goes with even the faintest strain of Pueblo blood, in spite of their implicit faith in the teachings of the Roman church they greatly feared the Pueblos' gods; and remembering the curse that lay upon the mines, they carefully kept from Davis whatever they may have known of El Tablon. Thus baffled, he became disheartened and was on the point of giving up, when he struck a new and promising lead.

Living in a little adobe house that stood in a clump of cottonwoods a short distance from Los Gatos, was a half-breed Pueblo, Ramon Garcia by name, whose occupation was herding goats. He had been brought up by his mother as a member of her tribe, and, when he reached the age of manhood, had been initiated into the mysteries of the Pueblos' religion, thereby learning all of their secrets. Later on he married a Mexican woman, and went to Los Gatos to live with her people. His wife was now dead, and only Panchita, his daughter, was living with him. Panchita was a pretty girl, having inherited Spanish features with her Spanish blood; and she was not entirely uneducated, a kind-hearted priest having taught her to read and write.

Happening to pass Ramon's house one day, Davis saw Panchita standing in the door, and struck by her prettiness rode up to ask for a drink of water; she brought it to him, and then stood answering his questions, artlessly telling him all that she knew concerning her father's life. He was overjoyed; here at last was one who could tell him of El Tablon, if anybody could; but when he asked to see Ramon, Panchita told him that he was gone to the hills with his goats, where he took them every day to graze. Though disappointed at the moment, Davis soon found cause to congratulate himself upon this circumstance.

As he rode on home, his busy brain had fresh plans made, and that night he wrote to Dan to tell him of these. "If I can get Ramon to talk," he said, "I'll have a cinch on finding the mine; the Pueblo priests know where it is, if anybody does; but there is where the trouble comes in; he's an Indian, and you know how close-mouthed Indians are. However, I have a scheme that I am sure will win out, but I'll have to play mighty careful cards; it is to work him through his daughter. My game is to get her in love with me, and, if she is as Spanish in nature as she is in looks, I'll soon have that done, when the rest will come easy-she'll pump Ramon for me."

Dan answered, "You'd better take the advice of an older fool and let that little Mexican girl alone, or else she'll send you home in a box. I know their style, and speak from a little experience of my own; they won't stand monkeybusiness in their love affairs, and it'll surprise soever should reveal to a white man the where- | you how handy they are with a knife."

Davis laughed when he read this, wondering what Dan's experience was, but paid no attention to his advice. He now went every day to Ramon's house, filling Panchita's pretty head with stories of the gay world beyond Los Gatos, and praises of her beauty; and within a month she loved him with all the ardor of her passionate race, and one day promised to marry him.

As long as he lives, Davis will remember that day and scene; throwing her arms around his neck, she whispered, "I do love you! Madre de Dios, I love you with all my heart and soul! And you?-Tell me that you will always love me, my darling. God of my soul, I would wish to kill you if ever you should not!" He shivered apprehensively, remembering Dan's warning, but the next moment recovered his self-control and began pouring into her ears promises of eternal constancy.

He wrote Dan of his successful love-making. adding, "I can't help but feel sorry for the silly little creature, she thinks so much of me, but then she is only a greaser, and so I'll not let that stand in my way."

To which Dan answered, "I hope you see your way clear to getting rid of your little greaser; I don't, and I wouldn't stand in your shoes for two silver mines. You'll find her a d-d sight harder to shake than to catch-it was that way with me."

A few days later he had another letter from Davis, telling him that Panchita had promised to pump her father concerning El Tablon. "She kicked clear out of the traces at first," he said, "not because she didn't want to help me, but because she was afraid the curse of those old Pueblo gods would fall on me. I am getting a little anxious as to what she may do when she gets onto my game, and so I want you to arrange to come here at a moment's notice; when I find the mine, I want you to take charge of it, so I can fly out without loss of time."

But the winning of Panchita seemed to put Davis no nearer to El Tablon; she reported that her father shook his head when she questioned him, saying that he knew nothing of the mine, farther than that it was accursed. Several days passed without anything being accomplished, and Davis was beginning to think of giving up his quest, when he received a letter that caused him to determine to do so, and to leave Los Gatos at once. This letter was from his wife, announcing her intention of joining him if he could not immediately return home. If there was anybody of whom he stood in awe, it was his wife; he wondered uneasily if she had heard of Panchita, and dreading the consequences should she come to Los Gatos and learn of his relations with the girl, decided to start for home the next morning.

He was packing his things when his door opened, and in walked Panchita, carrying a roll of discolored parchment, which she eagerly offered him, saying that it was about El Tablon. She made her father drunk, she explained, and while in that condition he had told her where to find the parchment. Instantly Davis forgot all about his wife and going home; opening the parchment, one glance told him that it was a rude map of the surrounding country, and half an hour's study of this and the crabbed Spanish text accompanying it told him just where to look for the mine.

Panchita did not wait for him to finish his examination of the map, but stole quietly out; and he was relieved to find her gone when he at last raised his head. Putting the map in his pocket, he wrote two telegrams, one to Dan, telling him to come at once, the other to his wife, telling her that he would start for home in a few days, and then hired a man to take him to the railroad, twenty miles away. This done, he at once began preparing to go to the mountains; the hour was too late for him to get back before night, and, intending to camp wherever darkness might find him, he was rolling his blankets, when he was startled to find his wife's letter had disappeared.

Could Panchita have taken it? he asked himself, cursing his carelessness in leaving it lying on his bed where she could see it. And then came a reassuring thought; what if she had taken it? it was hardly possible that she could read Spanish, much less English, and so would be unable to learn what it contained. But this was followed by another troublesome thought; she might get somebody to translate the letter for her-a priest for instance-she was a devout Catholic, he knew-and before starting he carefully saw to it that his revolvers were in good condition.

An hour's ride carried him to a wild spot in the mountains, where he left his horse and proceeded afoot, climbing the steep side of a mountain that towered far above him. When about half way up he stopped to consult the man: the sun had set, and it was already so dark that he could scarcely see to read. Then he went to a huge rock that stood not far away, and looking northward, singled out a snow capped peak that stood in that direction, and walked straight toward it, carefully spacing and counting his steps. Presently he stopped at a large, flat rock which lay partially buried in the earth; he had found El Tablon-the rock covered its entrance.

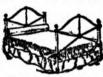

Forgetful of everything else, he was kneeling the view of putting in a blast to open the mine, SEARS, ROEBUCK & CO., CHICAGO, Davis did not spend that night in the mountains as he had intended; instead, he galloped back to Los Gatos, and happening to look on the floor behind his bed, found his wife's letter lying there. He went home the next day, Dan having arrived; and, as he and his wife are now numbered among the American residents of Paris, it is reasonable to presume that El Tablon lost nothing in richness during the many years that it remained closed.

T was in the far west, where trails were few and far between and the grave that caught my eye would not have been seen had not a deer that I had shot fallen near it.

Near where lay the dead buck, a white object riveted my attention; what was my surprise to find s well-cared for grave. It was marked by a marble tablet upon which I read:

"MYRTLE, Self-Sacrificed."

My guide told me that he knew the story of the grave; yet his frank confession that it cut him deep to tell of it, prevented my asking more of him and my mind began to weave its own sad romance about poor Myrtle.

"Do you see that mountain up yonder?" broke in the guide.

"Yes, and is that not a cabin upon it?"

"It is, and in that cabin lives the man who has the best right to tell you the story of this grave.

"Half a dozen years ago this grave was dug, and there was a thriving settlement just beyond where our camp is; but the Indians were hostile and the settlers moved nearer to the fort for protection."

"The man living on yonder cliff is my brother, several years younger than I am though you would not believe it, for his hair is as white as snow. Would you like to go up and see him, for he may tell you the story?"

I expressed a desire to go up to the little cabin on the cliff and meet his hermit brother, and the guide led the way.

The cabin was well built, so situated as to command a vast sweep of landscape and it looked comfortable.

"Ho, Alfred-" called out the guide and a faint voice within answered:

"Come in, Ned."

The hermit was there lying upon his bed and a glance showed him to be a sick man.

"Poor Alfred, you are ill."

"I have been for some days, Ned, scarcely able to get about, and I am glad to see you."

"I am camped near the old settlement, guiding a hunting party and this gentleman is one of the outfit, a writer, picking up notes for a book, I believe."

The hermit held out his hand and gave me a cordial greeting; but I noticed that he was burning with fever. I had some knowledge of medicine, and I asked the guide to return to our camp, several miles distant, and secure certain remedies as well as other things to make the unfortunate man comfortable.

In a couple of hours the guide returned, and I was glad to feel that I could render some service to the unfortunate recluse.

Leaving the hunting party to go without me, as they were to return that way within a few days, I was glad to devote myself to nursing the hermit back to health once more.

In a few days the hermit was himself again and from his lips I had heard the sad story of the grave.

When I too am at rest, it will not matterthe story may be told, but not before," he said. To-day Alfred Moore rests in the valley and I feel at liberty to make known the tragedy that marred two lives.

A well-to-do community of men, women and children were the people of the Bennings Settlement, conscious of their own strength, their capability to make a garden spot out of a wilderness while relying upon themselves alone for defense against the redskins.

Disgruntled.

Men Who Manufacture Misery.

The disgruntled man, the man who is sulky and dissatisfied under all conditions and circumstances, is to be found everywhere. Even at the seaside where he has gone for rest and recreation you'll find him surly and sulky, grumbling at the weather, the people, the hotel accommodations, the board, and everything else. His scowling, sullen visage checks the flow of talk at the table, and hushes the prattle of playing children. Now and again one gossip says to another, "The old chap's liver must be out of order." Somebody else says, "Perhaps he's suffering from kidney trouble." And a majority incline to the opinion that it's "just dyspepsia." And as it happens they are all of of the stomach and other organs of digestion them right. His liver is sluggish. His kid- and nutrition, enables the perfect digestion and neys are disordered. His blood is necessarily poisoned, by accumulations of effete matter. And last of all his stomach is "out of order." This is another case in which in the logical sequence of statement

THE LAST IS FIRST.

The liver is sluggish because the stomach is diseased. The kidneys are disordered because the stomach and its allied organs of digestion and nutrition are "weak" and cannot supply adequate nutrition for the needs of the body. How do we know this? Because in so many cases, persons who have suffered with disease of heart, liver, lungs, kidneys, etc., have found these diseases entirely cured, when Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has cured diseases of the stomach and the other organs of digestion and nutrition.

"I was afflicted with what the doctors called nervous indigestion. Took medicine from my family physician to no avail. In looking over one of Dr. Pierce's Memorandum Books," writes Mr. Thos. G. Lever, of Lever, Richland Co., S. C., "I found my case described exactly. wrote to you and made a statement. You sent me a descriptive list of questions, also hygienic rules. I carried these out as best I could, but thought myself incurable as I suffered so much with pain under my ribs and an empty feeling in my stomach. At night would have cold or hot feet and hands alternately. I was getting very nervous and suffered a great deal mentally, thinking that death would soon claim me. Always expected something unusual to take place; was irritable and impatient, and greatly reduced in flesh. I could scarcely eat anything that would not produce a bad feeling in my stomach. After some hesitation, owing to my prejudices against patent medicines, I decided to try a few bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pellets.' After taking several bottles of each, found I was improving. I continued for six months or more, off and on. I have to be careful yet at times, of what I eat, in order that I may feel good and strong. I fully believe if any one suffering with indigestion or torpid liver or chronic cold should take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets' and observe a few simple hygienic rules they would soon be greatly benefited, and with a little perseverance would be entirely cured."

THE SCHOOL-BOY'S POCKET

is notorious for the miscellany it contains. Tops, string, apples, marbles, chewing gum, nails, jack-stones, are all mixed in one confused mass. What would be said of one who used that pocket which we call the stomach for such a heterogeneous collection of materials? This is done not alone by the human ostrich at the circus, but by thousands of good people who do not consider the relations of the stomach to the other organs of the body. The purpose of eating is to provide nutrition for the body. But how many people think of the nutritive value of the food they eat? For the most part the choice of food is made to please the palate. The palate is a creature of education. It may be taught to crave things bitter or things sweet; to desire spicy or flery condiments which irritate the stomach, or dainties which distress it, and in which the food value is reduced to the minimum. As a rule the palate is taught to desire the most undesirable he could meet with refusal told her he would Among the maidens of the settlement, the things from the viewpoint of nutrition. The take her to his tepee and the people of his tribe result is that the stomach has to thresh a great quantity of straw to obtain one grain of nu-

The body is sustained by food properly digested and assimilated and converted into nutrition. But when the food lacks nutritive value the body and its organs must be starved. Exactly the same thing happens when the food eaten is nutritious, but the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition being weakened by disease, fail to extract the nutrition from the food provided. Then the body is starved also.

THE SIGN OF STARVATION

is weakness. A starved man can't work. A starved organ can't work; or at the best it works partially and ineffectively. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, by caring diseases assimilation of the food eaten, and this food converted into nutrition builds up the body and all its parts and organs into sound health and strength.

"After I had received the advice which you gave me in regard to my treatment," writes Geo. Dorner, Esq., of 1915 Pulaski Street, Baltimore, Md., "I used your 'Golden Medical Discovery' according to directions. After using four bottles I considered myself cured as I have not felt any symptoms since. Had tried almost all remedies that I heard of that were good for dyspepsia, but without relief. Finally I became discouraged and wrote to you for advice, with the above result."

TO DISCOURAGED PEOPLE.

The closing paragraph of Mr. Dorner's letter: "Finally I became discouraged and wrote to you for advice" would express the feeling of thousands who have written to Dr. Pierce. They have utterly failed to find help. They have been growing steadily worse. As a forlorn hope they have written to Dr. Pierce and have been cured. Persons suffering from chronic diseases are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter free. All correspondence strictly private and confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

bright particular star was Myrtle Carrington, loved by one and all. The only child of her father, petted yet not spoiled, she was the sunshine of his old age.

Her hero lover was Alfred Moore, handsome, courteous and the leader of the youths of the settlement. The tie between them was made public when Carrington gave his consent to their engagement. One day, in the absence of Moore, some of the members of the Pioneer Guard, of which he was the Captain, captured young Indian Chief, and they at once decided to make an example of him.

This example was to be at the end of a rope, and, but for the arrival of Myrtle Carrington ipon the scene, the career of the young chief would have ended then and there.

Had it been prior to the announcement of her engagement to Alfred Moore, the entreaties of Myrtle to spare the chief's life might have been listened to with favor; but those young hot heads felt a sweet revenge in refusing her request, and the ring-leader ordered his men to go on with the hanging.

Myrtle Carrington finding her entreaties corned, used another argument, a revolver.

"The man who touches hand to that rope hall kill," was the second argument and one ery much to the point.

"You have captured this chief, and wounded s he is, he deserves your compassion. He shall ride my horse back to the settlement and be cared for in my father's home until he is able to return to his people and it will thus change his hatred for us into friendship."

It was a bold stand for even Myrtle Carrington to take against a dozen men; but it won, and mounted upon the horse of one of the party the young chief was led by her into the settlement and to her own home.

Though a merciful precedent, it was a dangerous one, in that it brought to Myrtle's feet a redskin suitor whose method of wooing regarded from a pale face point of observation, was

Mr. Carrington and Alfred Moore looked at the affair as had Myrtle, that it would beget friendship with the Indians.

Won by the plack of his rescuer, enraptured with her beauty and deeply grateful for her kindness, the chief, second only to his father as a leader of his people, and " admiration of the dark-skinned maidens of his tribe, could not understand why he could not win the heart of the pale face girl.

In English that was expressed in ardent metaphor rather than according to the rules of syntax, he told of his love, and not believing would welcome her.

He was much crest-fallen and deeply pained when Myrtle explained to him that it could not be, that she was promised to one of her own race, and she was somewhat startled by the quick proposition to kill Alfred Moore and thus get rid of a rival.

But in her sweet way, Myrtle discarded her redskin suitor and gladly saw him depart, after a visit of several weeks, mounted upon a fine horse given him by Alfred Moore and leading a pack animal heavily laden with gorgeous blankets, provisions and many gifts that gladden an Indian's heart.

One day, a horseman in uniform dashed into the settlement and said that he was sent from the Post to ask Captain Moore and his men to go to the aid of an immigrant train hemmed in by Indians a score of miles away.

The young captain and forty men were in the saddle and away within half an hour, and the settlers met in council that night to prepare to defend their homes.

Mr. Carrington was away at the meeting and Myrtle was alone in their home. Suddenly a form glided into the room, so noiselessly that she knew not of his coming until he stood before her.

In full war paint though he was, Myrtle recognized the young chief whom she had befriended several months before, and though startled she calmly greeted him. Then she heard the cruel story he had to tell, listened to words that sent every drop of blood rushing to her heart and sealing her fate forever.

The horseman in uniform who had come to the settlement had not been a soldier from the Post but a renegade white man, a dweller in the chief's tribe, he told her, and was sent to draw off the fighting force from the settlement on a false errand.

With the chief, and completely surrounding the settlement, were hundreds of mounted braves ready to kill and destroy at a signal from him. That signal he would give unless Myrtle would return with him to his people. If she would do so he would call his warriors off and the hatchet would be buried between his tribe and her people.

It was an appalling ordeal for a young girl to face, and her brain reeled, her heart almost ceased its beating. She must give up her father, the man she loved dearer than her life, her home, her people, all-to dwell among savages, the toy of a young barbarian, yield everything life held dear to her, sacrifice herself to save others.

The moments passed, the chief patiently awaiting her decision with the stoicism of his race. Suddenly she turned to him but not to appeal for herself; it was for others she pleaded and she asked if he would keep his word to make no attack upon the settlement, if she would go with him? He answered in the affirmative and she said simply:

"I will go with you."

Then she wrote the terrible story she had to tell, both to Alfred Moore and to her father.

"It is my one life against many, and I do my duty as I see it," was the pitiful ending of her letter to Alfred Moore.

The Indian chief patiently waited for her while she prepared for her going with him, then led the way to his waiting horses, raised her to her saddle—for she was powerless to aid herself-and the trail was taken, a long line of silent horsemen falling in behind their leader. The one joy alone in the blackness of despair in Myrtle's heart was that the chief had been true to his word, that her sacrifice had saved her people.

How bitterly the blow fell upon the loving father when he returned to face the ghastly truth, was shown by the upturned dead face that greeted Alfred Moore when he came back soon after dawn, feeling that he had been tricked.

Alfred Moore rallied after weeks of suffering, with whitened hair, an old man before his time. Still true to his pledge to his pale face wife he young chief strove hard to calm the war spirit of his people; but he was beaten in the council tepee in every argument, other tribes struck at their white foes and the Bennings Settlement was driven to the protection of forts, and ashes alone marked the spot of the one-time happy homes.

Alfred Moore went not back with his people, but alone remained to avenge the girl he had so loved, and his record was a red one.

Beaten at last the Indians retreated further into the Land of the Setting Sun, leaving one grave that was strangely marked, for above it had been reared a monument of stone, the last tribute of the young chief to poor Myrtle who had so soon found oblivion beneath the sod.

The last shot fired in revenge by Alfred Moore was at a supposed red skin, but who was in reality the renegade white man who had sent him away from the settlement by a clever trick. Before he died he told Alfred Moore how quickly Myrtle had faded and died and where the young chief had buried her and marked her grave.

From that day Alfred Moore became a recluse, shunning his fellowmen, dwelling in the cabin he built for himself upon the cliff.

Through his brother he had ordered that simple marble monument with its strange inscription, and there by the side of poor Myrtle he at last found rest.

Such was the pitiful story.

MRS. Patten came out into the kitchen on tiptoe, and closed the door behind her softly.

"Everything is all right in there," she said. "Maria is sleeping as quiet as can be. It doesn't look now as if there would be much for us to do, tonight, for the doctor said if she slept, not to disturb her.

"Almira and Hubbard are both as sound asleep, too, as logs of wood," she added, "and I don't wonder; for Maria's been sick so long they haven't had a decent night's rest since nobody knows when. I told Almira before they went to bed, not to hurry up in the morning, bein' it's Sunday, but just try and get their sleep made up a little. I ain't in no hurry about goin' home in the morning, because John's wife will see to gettin' breakfast, an' I told Almira you said you'd just as lief walk over home as to ride, when you was ready to go."

"Yes," said Mrs. Berry, Mrs. Patten's companion, as she cast a glance out through the kitchen window into the darkness, "I just as soon walk as not, if it don't storm no more then than it looks now as if it was agoin' to."

Mrs. Berry was sitting in a rocking chair,

Mrs. Berry was sitting in a rocking chair, knitting. "It seems good, doesn't it," she said, "to think that Maria is really gettin' well. For all she's been so poorly she's always done a sight of good. How many times I've heard my mother say, 'Maria Todd is the salt of the earth.'"

"I know," replied Mrs. Patten. "It's just so. How long she's been ailin'. Do you know," she went on, with a half covert glance up at the big clock, above which the regal eyes of a great bunch of peacock feathers glowed dully in the lamp light. "I can't help but wonder sometimes whether peacock feathers do really have anything to do about bringin' sickness into a house. You know lots of folks say they do."

Into a house. You know lots of lolks say they do."

"I know they do," replied Mrs. Berry; "but goodness me! I don't take no stock in it. Why, my father kept peacocks for years when I was a girl at home, an' except for their just about makin' a body deaf with their screechin' I never could see that they did any harm. An' they do keep the hawks off.

"Don't you think," she added, her eyes following those of the other woman to the clock, "that we better have something to eat? I begin to feel kinder sleepy."

"that we better have something to eat? I begin to feel kinder sleepy."

"Yes," said Mrs. Patten, "so do I. It's most eleven o'clock, too. You just set there comfortable, an' I'll stir up the fire, an' make some good strong tea. Almira showed me where she keeps everything, in the but'ry, an' I said to her then that I didn't see how, with all she's had to do, that she could keep her work up so."

"It's her way," said Mrs. Berry. "She ain't like some women, who turn 'round all day in a peck measure."

Mrs. Patten set the table, and both women partook of cold roast pork, bread and butter and sauce, pie, cake and tea. When they had finished, and Mrs. Patten had noiselessly washed the dishes in the kitchen sink and returned from another visit to the front room, she said: she said

"Now Mrs. Berry you better lay down on the lounge and try to get a nap. There's no use both of us keepin' awake."

"No, of course there ain't," admitted Mrs. Berry. "I don't seem to 'feel sleepy, now, though. That tea you made sorter chirked me up. Why don't you lay down yourself?"

"I don't feel sleepy either. I guess I'll just warm my feet a mite. They got kinder cold, what with my goin' into that back but'ry." She opened the door of the low oven in the cooking stove and placed her feet on the edge of the oven. Both women were silent for several minutes, and the click of Mrs. Berry's knitting needles was the only noise to be heard.

Mrs. Patten was the first to speak. "Did you ever know Mrs. Jonathan Stillings?" she asked. "I met her once, to a district convention," as the reply. "That was before her husband was the reply.

Mrs. Patten laughed a jolly little laugh, and then looked up suddenly in a half-guilty way at the door which went into the other part of the house, as if she had forgotten herself.
"I never watch anywhere," she said, "but what I think of one night when I watched with her. That was when I lived in Bath and was the strangest experience I ever had. It was the night before Easter." She stooped down to touch the side of the oven with her finger, to touch the side of the oven with her finger, to see if the stove was hot enough to scorch her touch the side of the oven with her finger, to see if the stove was hot enough to scorch her shoes, and went on.

"Jonathan Stillings' and Ebenezer Shadrack's farms lay right side by side, there in Bath, an' the two families was as intimate as a cup an' saucer, until one day Jonathan had a blooded Jersey heifer get through the line fence into Eb's field and eat up about a quarter of an aere of cabbages. Of course so much green feed made the critter sick, an' she took the colic an' died. They couldn't agree which one was to blame, because the heifer got through a gap where the two strips of line fence jined each other, an' each man said it was the other's business to have seen to it that the hole was fixed. So Jonathan sued Eb for the loss of the heifer, and Eb sued Jonathan for the loss of the cabbages. First one got his case an' then the other. Then they both appealed, an' both decisions was reversed, an' so it went on just like that for years.

"They each had one child; Eb a son, an' Jonathan a daughter, an' everybody, includin' the young people themselves I reckon, had looked to see the two farms marry, for the children had always been fond of each other.

"But goodness! As soon as the lawing began each father up an' declared no child of his'n should marry a child of the other; an' they carried the day, for they always was bigoty men, both of them.

"Folks used to wonder how it would come out; when one year providence stepped in an' took a hand, an' Jonathan and Ebenezer both died, within six months of each other, one of pneumonia an' the other of typhoid fever.

"Well, we neighbors looked to see the trouble end then for the women folks, payer had took things to heart as their husbands nad, but do you know, the minute Jonathan was gone, his wife acted just as if she thought his mantle had settled on her shoulders, an' she up an' got just Ebenezer Shadrack unless you do it over my dead body.

"Well, Jane Ellen had spirit enough of her own, but she was a real nice girl, an' of course she couldn't go against her own mother, an' she all the near relation she had got in the world, an' so she give Eb's boy his freedom.

"Well, it run on like that for some three or four years, when Mrs. Stillings herself was took down sick with pneumonia, the same disease her husband died of. She was hard sick from the first, an' it wasn't long before everybody who was there said there wasn't more than one chance in a hundred for her. I didn't believe that night when I went to watch that she'd live through the night, no more did didn't believe that night when I went to watch that she'd live through the night, no more did anybody else, so there was several neighbors stayed there, beside myself.

"About midnight she begun to run right down fast, an' some of those there thought she was gone, but it seemed to me all the time as if I could feel a mite of pulse. I kept my fingers on her wrist, an' bime-by I felt it beat again plain, an' then come stronger an' stronger. All at once she opened her eyes, full upon Jane Ellen, who had set right there by the bed, an' she said, as rational an' plain as could be, only weak, of course:

Troubles ain't to be carried out of this world. I've meant right by your father's memory, but I was wrong. You may marry William Shadrack; an' I want you to do it now, here, before I die."

"'Mother!' was all that Jane Ellen said.

"'I said now,' said Mrs. Stillings, faint, but enough like the Mrs. Jonathan Stillings I had neighbored with for fifteen years so I knew she

"'You go an' git him,' I said, 'an' I'll tell Mr. Fitts.' That was the minister,—one of the best men the Lord ever made. He had been settled there for years, an' no house where there was sorrow ever found him wantin'. He was out in the settin'-room then, I knew, waitin' in hopes he might be able to say something to comfort Jane Ellen.

"I said, 'You do as your mother says, an' hustle, too.'

"I reckoned I hadn't known Mrs. Jonathan Stillings fifteen years for nothing.

"Did she die?" asked Mrs. Berry, whose knitting had fallen forgotten in her lap.

"Land, no;" was the answer, "an' ain't dead yet. It wa'n't long ago I saw her tendin' Jane Ellen's twins while their father and mother had gone to Boston on an excursion. Queer, wasn't it?"

ISFORTUNES, they say, never come singly, and trouble always travels in pairs. So it was not to be wondered at, though it was certainly greatly to be deplored, when the number of the faithful few left to the X. Y. Z. Road by the strike was much lessened by sickness. A fever, it was, that cut the men down in reckless fashion.

That was how it came about that I who was in no way ready for it yet, came to be running No. 27 on the short and dangerous connecting line across a picturesque stretch of mountain country.

Bess was nervous from the first, but I laughed at her, a trifle upset, perhaps, myself. She insisted upon going up to the village into which I pulled at midnight and where I stayed till seven in the morning. So she went up with the little kid, and my heart was lighter as midnight came on.

But Bess was anxious. The landlady told me that she could settle to nothing all day. Every night she waited up for me. I teased her and laughed at her, all in vain. She shook her pretty dark head and said gently:

"I hope I am just as silly as you pretend to think me, Tom," and that was all. The road was indeed full of danger, especially now that hands were few and often unfoliable and inefficient. And after nightfall, it may be that my hand was not quite steady on the lever. But I'm not considered a coward as the lever of the lever of the lever. now that hands were few and often unremay be that my hand was not quite steady on the lever. But I'm not considered a coward as my present position shows.

Sometimes the sky that always keeps a fellow sort of braced up was cut off by overhanging crags and cliffs. And there were two long tunnels. In several places the track lay upon a narrow shelf along the steep mountain side, and a man might look up or down according to his faith. One of these shelves, and the worst one, since the curve was short and the track hidden beyond, lay upon the mountain side just two miles out from the village where Bess waited. I wasn't exactly afraid of this curve, but I was always glad when I pulled in safe and sound at the station.

I had been running No. 27 for three weeks when one midnight as we neared the short curve, the fireman, a mere lad, caught my arm and cried: "Look!"

Ahead of us I saw a curious light. It was soft and white and steady, resting there in the darkness about five feet above the track. Going down from it, and widening as it neared the track fell a thin curtain of light that reaching the ties lay in a white blotch upon them. This white spot was six cornered and sharply outlined and to my excited imagination suggested a coffin, in shape.

"A Will o' the wisp," I shouted. "Wonder we haven't seen 'em before, these wet fall nights. Don't get scared of a shadow, Bill."

Bess was, I thought, a trifle more nervous and wide-eyed. I laughingly threatened to send her home to her mother. She gravely shook her head and I kissed her good bye and laughed when she refused to watch me out of sight, calling back to say how superstitious she was growing.

That night the light was in its place just as we had seen it the night hefore. Neither of new the send the track the proper the send the same the proper the send the short the night hefore. Neither of new the send the short the night hefore.

of sight, calling back to say how superstitious she was growing.

That night the light was in its place just as we had seen it the night before. Neither of us said anything, but we looked at each other. The third night we both looked for it. "She's on time," Bill said with a sickly grin. There it was, clear and steady and stopping with that coffin-shaped splotch. It was ghastly, but I answered Bill's grin with one I felt to be scarcely more wholesome. We pulled in safely, however, and was feeling bolder when Bill pulled my sleeve as I was leaving the engine to hurry home to Bess. home to Bess.

home to Bess.

"It's the third warnin" he said huskily.
"Somethin's goin' to happen. I sha'n't say onthin' an' I sha'n't desert you, but look out!"

I laughed, not quite merrily, perhaps, and went to Bess. Her pretty face looked thin and white and her smile was very feeble. I noticed that the dimples had gone with her bright color. I gathered the small woman into my arms and scolded and petted her, but she lay quite still with her cheek against mine.

"I'm afraid, Tom. I feel danger near. Truly, now, don't you?"

"I'm afraid, Tom. I feel danger near. Truly, now, don't you?"

She turned and looked straight into my eyes. I thought of the strange light, but I laughed and promised her a new ring if she would make haste and get strong. A woman will do nearly anything for a new ring. But Bess shook her head in that decided little way of hers.

"If I could just be of use, Tom; if I could do anything," she said as if she had come to care very little about pretty things. That frightened me far more than the mysterious light had done.

Buy at Wholesale Prices

Here is a store with 25 acres of floor space, filled with $2,500,000 worth of merchandise. There is every kind and style of everything that people buy. Two thousand clerks are employed here to serve you. And our prices are wholesale prices—the very lowest in America.

And this store—wherever you are—is practically brought to your home in the form of our catalogue. In this book we show everything, describe and price everything. No ordinary store carries a hundredth part of the 70,000 things that our catalogue offers you.

You can get what you want by simply writing a letter. We send it under our guarantee that it will satisfy you and that it will reach you safely. The millions of dollars invested in this business insure that every customer will get exactly what he wants.

You can buy by mail as safely as in person.

Competition is Impossible

In 1872 we originated this plan of catalogue buying. In 29 years we have grown to have 2,000,000 customers. We have gained this trade, and held it, by treating people fairly. There has never been a word of exaggeration or misrepresentation in our catalogues.

Our purchases now equal the purchases of two thousand average stores combined. We save what it costs the makers of hundreds of different lines to send an army of salesmen to sell to those 2,000 dealers. We save the profits and expenses of those two thousand separate stores.

With our enormous purchases, we buy at prices close to the making cost. Our average cost is perhaps a quarter less than the average cost to dealers.

There is no store and no mail order house that can compete with us. It is possible to cut some articles below us, as leaders. Or a false description may make an inferior article seem equal to our better grades. But there is no honest way for underselling us in general; for no one will even claim to buy lower than we do.

The Right Way to Buy

When you buy from a dealer you pay from 15 to 50 per cent more nan our prices. Figure out what that means on the sum of your than our prices. yearly purchases.

You have only a limited stock to select from. Here you find everything that all stores combined can show.

You are wasting a third of the money you pay, on an average.

We ask you to join the two million customers who send their orders here. Save the money you now pay as tribute to your dealer, and spend it on things that will benefit you.

I wanted to change the subject and was not sure.

I didn't like the queer, far away look in her eyes, and so before I left in the morning I looked up the good old doctor and had him promise to go in to see her at once. It was raining and there was one of those dreary, uncompromising east winds. There had been a siege of murky weather. Bill said it was stretched out thin to cover all the days possible. But today the rain was not so thin and before night it set in sharply as if the job must be finished without further delay. The cold rain came driving straight from the east.

Before we reached the last curve I saw Bill looking for the light. I, too, began to keep an eye out for it. Far ahead I saw it, white and still in spite of the wind, and presently, outlined against it, I saw a woman's figure. I saw that she was standing on the track, straight and tall. My arm weakened, my right hand forgot its cunning, but I heard the sharp, repeated warning and knew that Bill was trying still in spite of the wind, and presently, outlined against it, I saw a woman's figure. I saw that she was standing on the track, straight and tall. My arm weakened, my right hand forgot its cunning, but I heard the sharp, repeated warning and knew that Bill was trying to stop the train.

My eyes were on her face, now that we were nearer and the head light shone against that other light. I saw the white, thin face with the dark hair blowing about it and I knew that it was Bess! She wore a loose white clinging garment and her little hands were held high. One in warning to me, and the other pointing backward toward the curve.

I stood like a stone. I heard Bill panting like a dying beast. Slowly, slowly the engine stopped, too late! The sound as of many waters confused me. I felt Bill pulling at me. I heard men calling to know what was the matter.

scopped, to late: The sound as of many waters confused me. I felt Bill pulling at me. I heard men calling to know what was the matter. Bill was silent as I. Somebody said:

"Get him away, he's about to die!" I lifted my feet and Bill dragged me along. Others followed after. Around the curve Bill stopped.

"See!" he said pointing with curious calmness at the place upon which he turned the light of his lantern. Quantities of rock and earth loosened by the rains had fallen from the mountain side and lodged upon the track.

"She knew," I said. I heard Bill sob. "Did you tell them?" I asked. He beckoned to a man who came to me, and I saw Bill going back. I wondered vaguely if her pretty face would be marred. I knew how tender the men would be. They carried me home, silently.

"You are a bit late," Mrs. Sims said, meeting me. "And I never did hear the train come in, the rain is so noisy on the roof. Why, sir, are you ill?"

"Bess!" was all I could say, as they put me into a low chair.

"O, yes, you've heard, then. It was a queer turn she had, but she's come round nicely. Dr. turn she had, but she's come round nicely. Dr. Mead was puzzled, as he owned himself, but she's all right now, she come to a quarter of an hour ago." As she finished speaking she opened the door to our room and I saw Bess lying white and smiling on the bed. I felt glad that her pretty face was not marred. I staggered toward her, sobbing brokenly. How quickly they had brought her and made her fair to see! I kneft beside her and bowed my head.
